Late Night Replay at Buddy's Exxon

Kevin Cantwell
Late Night Replay At Buddy's Exxon

Everything visible
drained to white
so that his brain went blind & an iced
runnel of nerve prickle jumped electric through his spine & he jelled in mid-
reach for a carton
of Camels, the whole
animal of his heart,
cramped & twisted
like an arm between his shoulder blades,
turned to what it scented,
tuned to any movement,
as if its movement
would send impulse
spinning
through its hairpin
curves, would touch off the firing pin
submerged in the action:
the dicy nerves
of the Luger, which
quivered and sniffed
and nuzzled his nape
like a doberman's nose.

Alone in the slump
& churn of adrenaline's
soup, he shut down
the pumps, cut
the lights, the cash
drawer agape
like a broken jaw.
Half-way home: how he couldn't remember. Under the streetlight—the chrome glitter of waxed leaves: the reflection of toy guns in sunlight: the kid from around the block of his past, denying the outcome of a battle: Screaming that he was alive, not dead, alive. . . .