Hosting the Beavers

From this clinic
I can see the huge chunks of snow still melting in the mountains, waiting like salmon
to make a run.
That is where it starts — past the fat rivers and up canyons where waters, crystal on crystal, gather,
gush in chutes,
cut igneous tracks, fork and unfork and are a creek trotting itself through cottonwoods and meadows like a green horse.

I hug a knee to my chest.
A finger as big as a scroll is shoved up my ass,
clicking high in my head
the clear purpose
of their flat wide tails, like stove lids, shielding their inside world.
And a world it must be.
I have seen their work — crazed water stilled and widened into ponds like paw prints, mammoth trees felled and kneeling at stumps over mounds
of their own white tears, gnawed concentrically
from their hearts.
Like wide, white teeth pinching life from bark, things tear in my stomach, splinter my guts. Parasites, they think, sent by beaver,
time-released, bobbing microscopic from beaver shit to my own chilled lips — invisible,
until one day
they quicken
and ball me up like an egg.

I swallow four feet
of encapsulated
string, one end taped to my face.
I must wait like a cat five hours, the string uncoiling in my bowels, winding itself into place.
They say the gag reflex
is the trick
when they pull it out to check, finally,
their catch.

I think about beaver country, how a life must pass now without seeing that rippling of back into water.
I think about a ranch
I worked hard on one summer.
The Resistol hat I bought with my first wages tipped back high
on my head for a week.
Then — one day the hot work and my belly too young even for beer, and my puke knitted bale by bale into a looser and looser haystack.
The dark ride home on the Greyhound.
The stops in Absarokee and Columbus and the crumpled hat — 100% beaver — spinning into the blackness just outside Laurel.

The string pulls on my face, biting into the corner of my mouth.
I pull up some slack
and with it a green bitter taste.
My insides are alive
with climbing this rope.
They swim my dark channels.
The string tugs.
I am pond.
