FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

The latest issue of the Montana State University Anthropology and Sociology Papers is dedicated to Ronald C. Jennewein and Carl Christopher Koetter, anthropology majors who lost their lives while working on an archaeological survey at Fort Peck Reservoir last summer.

The memorial issue contains a book review by Koetter and a paper about an archaeological investigation in which Jennewein participated. The latter was written by Jennewein's fellow student, George Arthur.

The publication, edited by Dr. Carling Malouf of the Department of the Department of Sociology, Anthropology and Social Welfare, includes papers by staff members Gordon Browder, Robert J. Dwyer, Raymond L. Gold and Albert C. Heinrich and by students Leslie B. Davis and Michio Kitahara.

Koetter, 23, and Jennewein, 24, were drowned June 28, 1962, when their boat capsized in the treacherous waters of Fort Peck Reservoir. They were members of an archaeological party working on a cooperative research project of the University and the National Park Service. The other five members of the crew succeeded in hanging on to the overturned craft for eight hours and were picked up by an Air Force Rescue helicopter.

Koetter was born in Charlottesville, Va., attended St. Paul's School in Concord, N. H., and was graduated from high school in Albany, N. Y. He won his "jump boots" with the 101st Airborne Division. Upon completion of military service he entered MSU to prepare for a career in anthropology.

Jennewein was born in Douglas, Wyo., and was graduated from high school in Lusk, Wyo. He was an Air Force Cadet for 18 months before he and his wife moved to Missoula in 1959 so he could work for a degree in anthropology at the University.
