Spring 1990

Early Shift

Martha Wickelhaus

Let us know how access to this document benefits you.

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarworks.umt.edu/cutbank

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://scholarworks.umt.edu/cutbank/vol1/iss33/8

This Poetry is brought to you for free and open access by ScholarWorks at University of Montana. It has been accepted for inclusion in CutBank by an authorized editor of ScholarWorks at University of Montana. For more information, please contact scholarworks@mso.umt.edu.
She had wanted to walk out into the desert to look at the sky. Now, this seems beside the point. There are stars enough, and the desert is there, but she’s tired, and in this tiredness she realizes that she knows all she is going to know. She rests her head on the roof of the car. On the highway below a truck backfires.

Robin Beeman

---

Early Shift

What moves him to wake from dark into dark, to wander sleep-baffled from bed to the lighted hall? What shakes the dream out, this slow acceptance in? He pulls back the curtain, sees the homes of his neighbors, faces what makes him daily rise, the spin of wheels and gears that requires him to dress his body, one arm, one leg at a time, and feed it. He passes each morning the beds of his children, touches his lips to the rise and fall of their sheets, but resists his desire to lift their charmed bodies and carry them with him, never speaks to calm the muttering that breaks from his wife as she sleeps. What in that blue dawn makes him shine his car lights into day, knowing when he comes back none of this will be changed?

Martha Wickelhaus