Course Description:

Anthropology 329 is a course about processes of social change in non-western societies. This semester's focus is on social change in sub-Saharan Africa, and on the economic, political, demographic, and cultural factors that can become involved. Some of the major forces shaping social change in recent decades are controlled by people and institutions involved in "development". Since WWII the so-called "development industry" has developed a life of its own, and the ways in which the major players in international development affect the lives of local people in Africa will be an important part of the course. We will be looking at the role and impact of the World Trade Organization, the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund, USAID (US Agency for International Development) and other bilateral aid organizations, and a variety of NGOs (non-government organizations) in recent social change in selected countries of sub-Saharan Africa. Examining the successes and failures of a variety of development projects and a novel by Barbara Kingsolver on the lives of Christian missionaries in Congo-Kinshasha, the course will teach students about some of the ways in which social change has occurred and is occurring in this region, and why.
