Evening Encounter

Mervin Mecklenburg
Evening Encounter

-Sacrifice Cliff, above Billings, Montana

I cannot say what brought me to this edge from the distant streets below, where the moon dimmed by the lights, tangles in telephone wires. I look down on the shadowy nighthawks circling above the smashed Ford Coupe at the bottom, and envy those old warriors, the two who rode their ponies into the air off this cliff, a last attempt to appease whatever was killing their families with smallpox.

What a clean break, I think. One plunge and all the world is purged. But when I turn and meet them, standing again, they seem to reproach me,
their ribs sticking out like quills.
Pale grey in the glow of the city below, their mouths gape as if trying to explain how the earth abandoned their ponies' hooves, and the rocks far below grew toward them, like scabs from the ground.

Mervin Mecklenburg