Retelling the Story

The moon rides fast
these new black nights and walking's cold. You can click your teeth and head home or stalk your shadow the length of its legs backward—to mornings you've already loved, to a story you've already told.

You tell it again:
you're taking the trail that climbs to the Pass.
An early morning. A two-year-old rides your shoulders, an elf in her dark blue hood.
A five-year-old's tawny thatch bobs before you, the only warm color in the low autumn sky of gray sky.

There's bounce to the sturdy trudge of the boy up ahead. The mountains take shape as you climb, step after step on the trail's gray rock, rock broken by wind and by cold. You're nearing those clouds with their promise of storm when a flutter in the boy's thatch blurs orange, is red, is black: a butterfly clings to the gold of his hair, the only warm color riding the mountain.

You call out, "Son, a butterfly's resting in your hair!" He stops, turns back to you slowly, wonder blue in his eyes, his smile sly with caution. He turns again to the Pass, his head held still so his stride won't jostle his lovely burden. And the last long mile to the wind at the top the butterfly clings to the boy's gold thatch, to the only warm color rising.
