Miss Biggs

D. J. Smith

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarworks.umt.edu/cutbank

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Let us know how access to this document benefits you.

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://scholarworks.umt.edu/cutbank/vol1/iss45/8

This Poetry is brought to you for free and open access by ScholarWorks at University of Montana. It has been accepted for inclusion in CutBank by an authorized editor of ScholarWorks at University of Montana. For more information, please contact scholarworks@mso.umt.edu.
Some said she only stumbled or, She was having a fit. She did totter there for a moment, the class going quiet, wondering if this was for effect. Then she started up again as the tiny lights under glass of a pinball machine will whirr on slowly, my teacher, though I did not know it then, beautiful in her desolation, in a print dress matching the liver spots flecked over her arms, somehow, still alive in the midst of our savagery and boredom. Some said her mind seized, the way an engine clenches at its heart, but it was arcing, electric, clearly there was movement, her limbs fluttering, her eyes reaching back. As a young woman, she says, stops and stares at Jerry Zuniga, his huge half-back frame folded into a desk, as if she knew his face would collapse inward that spring like a rotting pumpkin—leukemia, a word that was opening before us like a flower, her lips trembling now, the petals of a flower battered by rain. Deep, she stutters, in the down-hung apple branches dusk gathered. Swallows came clustering like bees.

And we think it's all right. Jesus, it's one of her poems or another hard luck story. She whirls around once, as if looking for something she has lost. The sun going where it must, she says this, before sprawling across the green and white checkered linoleum, the ambulance people and the principal in his worried brown suit and his brogues of authority, shouting us out of the room, some of the girls refusing, some crying all of us gawking and swallowing though, now I think, not really caring very much.

We were there, she breathes. Oh, it was sometime during the depression, the men all gone, useless and ruined. Women with their hair streaming; oh god, can you imagine such women, our skirts full of fruit, standing there, silent by a bend in the river, leaves scattered over the surface, swirled and glinting in sunlight.