But We Shall All Be Changed

Robert Hill Long
The minor devil wears a leather bomber and overshoes to push through night-slush and sleet to the house of two retiring angels assigned to distract him in Cleveland. He’s handed a plate of delicacies, like local angels; bookcase speakers hymn them in with piano jazz; the white-haired hosts grind coffee beans; angels talk poetry beneath a watercolor of a green cantaloupe sunning apples on a brass tray.
When the host painted it, his wife and New York City were young, he tells the minor devil, were more devilish. The host’s green fruit will never decay.
The devil envies this hospitality that beams, through the snow, a homing signal to all the locals practicing short-winged flights across Cleveland. His own flight pattern is a free-fall sideways across America, homeless as a cloud. But the same clear signal homed in on him. Here he stands, almost human for one night in this house where the difference between what he is and what he could be closes in, angel after homely angel. This fresh drink placed in his hand, this seeking of his opinion—hell blows away outside, and whom can he thank?
The hosts insist on thanking him for flying into Cleveland; for permitting them to take him, dressed like a nice heretic, to the Brahms Requiem.
Blessed be the dead, the chorus was singing in Severance Hall. I thought I’d have to die to be done with this devil pose, he tells his protector: I didn’t guess I could lose it simply by flying to Cleveland. Have another deviled egg, the hostess says. He does. He wants to kiss her for feeding him like an angel among snow clouds; her bright cloud hair makes his gray young.
He could thank them all for ignoring his big ingrown horns, his slightly sulfurous breath. Narcissism is hell, however minor its mirror, however invisible. In this air of tiny crystal wings cleaving to Cleveland his heart is squeezed as though by a gold band that marries him to a strange idea that death and hell can simply be canceled anywhere he pronounces the unlikely mantra Cleveland. The painted cantaloupe shines like a green sun while angels bid him goodnight and step, one by one, into the knife wind. Just one minute more, he says. Cleveland, he says, and opens the door.