Once we forget day the clearing fills with light. No trees block the stars and the sky blues towards Washington. Headlights stutter along the highway, then shine a steady moment at the bridges. From the first ridge below this mountain top, the spring begins in pines its sixteen mile run past thickets of alder, past interludes of moose-loved sedge, through culverts we explored as kids, batting down webs and their spiders with sticks, the random traffic coming like airplanes overhead, infrequent and far away, until, finally, now a creek, it spills cold water into the sun-warmed shallows of Luby Bay, on the northwestern shores of Priest Lake. We are living again, Bob and I, near the start of the water's week-long trip, in a lookout tower we haven't seen in twenty years, the less important two-thirds of our lives, enough to forget the helix of stairs between tar-coated legs.
Bob wants to play cards in the dark, so we move the two chairs out onto the catwalk.
Once we forget the hissing, yellow light of propane wicks, we see the wind, a down-valley-breeze, turn up the white undersides of aspen leaves. Balanced on the railing, the last slice of apple glows like scrimshaw, like a whale bone carefully scored and inked.

The radio catches an AM skip of accordions and voices we can’t understand. We think we recognize Bush, _Yeltsin and Murmansk_, and Luby Bay shines red and white with running lights. Bob shuffles the cards. He deals and I spread out my hand to gather the childhood light of stars.
