Elegy 2

Christopher Janke
ELEGY 2

You encourage like a cadaver, like a spur, like a heartworm at work in the heart;

you’re a beautiful chewer, a terrible want,
the shadow stalled on a meadow.

You make the crickets speak to you, so I speak— o birch tree peeling,

o truculent finch, o lecher,
o rusty can, o holder of things apart,

o briar bush pushed through my veins, o seraphic wind— you pass to the left, to the, right, all the way through,

o worn spot on my knee—

inside and all over.
I walk through the city pinching violets;

I spread oil on my eyes.
I open a manhole; you’re inside, feasting with the forgotten, laurels in your hair and the smell of gin on your lips. On both sides of the street, the world is on fire.

A freighter rests
on the burning stairs.
I greet you with the sound of a knife through lettuce, with seagulls on an ebullient bay, with a quiet kiss in a quiet house.

We were migrants on a flatbed—

I was the wheelless cart you had to pull, the bird with a broken wing that hobbled towards you across the first divide. Now, I'm a child, swung up by both arms,

high enough to fear the gap between my tongue and the ground.