On Poetry

Every morning fresh with birds, an incessant ache that asks: be everywhere.
City of No City

There is a bridge in search of you. Cables hold fog suspended and the burning coal of taillights masks the faces moving toward what I want to name a house out of the rain because I must not leave before I arrive. That I could walk into the shipyards and watch the containers, black with salt stains, lowered to the ground, or stand beneath the cranes, mechanical hands too large for the sky moving cargo back to earth, back for the dead weight of coins, but go on past the stalled cars mid-way with tires gone and windows that have been eaten from the inside.
I have gone from one city into another and this one speaks in factory roofs, in the sound of rain over bent backs, hand small levers, while dreams move inside minds like waves—Exit signs everywhere, no passport with no name written inside it, invisible wires cross-hatching this life to the sound of iron clanking as men shake hands on the corner and stores un-lock their windows for the day in this city whose indifference is this pulse, red in the vein. The children still sleeping continue to rise— an ache like the sound of bells—take from this street the glass and make it a table from which we eat, if digesting these shards would bring you closer— line the walls with alphabets that you could arrange into the directions to your house— I would explain to the loud owner of the corner store as the children begin to enter that she must not shut you out. The bars on the windows saying that there is no other way for now, for now, children take my hand and tell me I am their teacher. That somehow I can be larger than the pieces of iron holding back sunlight in the classroom, that I am armed with more than these holes in the walls, holes in rooms where mothers and fathers cannot comb your hair, and the sound of death pulled through the open door of this city which we fill with paper carrying the names of what we think you are called.
History of the West (one)

It started with the shovel, hard against my wooden deck, clearing two feet of snow that had fallen while we slept.
I know I had been dreaming for hours before I heard the blade’s clear scrape into ice.
And you were there. Everything: white and gleaming. At first, we did not see anything except lilacs blooming outside my window and the Blackfoot’s swollen banks.
Birds flew in and out of the Clarkfork valley as we walked the dogs. I was afraid for a long time of the horses. There were other things, too, that I feared.
Facing the Wind

I walk out with the dogs toward the cemetery, the stone graves wounded by ice and wind, stationary and voiceless, rough as sand, secret as dead languages. The dogs pick-up sticks and chase each other in the snow. The willow branches are gold in the winter sky and for a moment it is not as hard to say, this is all there is. The tall willows at the edge of the road scarcely move in the wind.
Snowing over the Missions. Near the dead deer the coyotes leave no tracks. Jocko Valley’s river is thick with ice, and on the fence tattered Tibetan prayer flags in the wind. It washes through them as if all the old monks were somewhere forgotten. It is easy to believe all this falling without utterance is significant. Even if we could go beyond language, what holy words could bring the metamorphosis we’ve been asking for? Watching snow pile over trees—even the wind blows in several directions.

A gaunt thing crawls through the sky.
It is hungry and cries for days above the village where a mother leaves clothes to dry across the courtyard. The billowing shirts and red scarves look like party banners, swaying between windows staring in opposite directions, as if to announce a festival. When fathers begin to hear sounds from the sky, they feel a craving beneath their breastbones.
Everyone in the village prays. They hide the laundry inside. Legs and sheets hang from nails on ceiling beams. Dresses hum with heat.
They float headless.

No longer of a single origin, your own breathing reminds you that there are things you must remember to let go. They were here. In the smallest way footprints are erased by snow, and the bean stalks are skinny against dry wind. Hurry, the mountains fall away in every direction, fossils disappear into tourist shops along the highway, the Sangre de Christo’s iron-red earth bleeds into night. We are all melting into ideas of ourselves, wax into small bowls.

We were not given this life, my father said, stepping up a slope covered with blooming mule’s ear, scrub oak newly in leaf and tiny spots of snow melting in the white sunlight, to waste it on inaction. I knew he was talking about spring and his faith in science.
He had seen a boy he loved die from the disease they were tracking through Bolivia, whole villages ruined by the virus, his machete cutting through the jungle attempting to solve the puzzle. We continue up the path through rocks blushed with browns and reds, a turkey vulture circling above. I want language to be responsible, and before I can continue he points to the worn mountain mahogany, three scars where it was hit by lightning. We can see the hospital small like shoeboxes along the foothills. There is supposed to be one word at the end, explaining. There is silence at the end, and it doesn’t explain, it doesn’t even ask.
History of the West (two)

There is no key to sadness.
Rooms enter into one another once you have found your way there.
I have decided for the sake of survival that the pine needles are singing.
They are singing for someone who has died. Singing in blue stitches that belong on the hem of the tall woman’s dress as she crossed the plains, buzzards and crows following her wagon train.
I have decided that mountains collect rain the way memories are conglomerate.
It isn’t just the notion of blood in the grass, but that the notes falling through needles can never be given back, or held as apology.
Doorway

There is a room with doorways everywhere, some of which can never be opened again.
Behind one stand bodies of children you remember from your dreams.
The hallway is filling with paper—each piece has been written on by hand.
The signatures in pencil stand for how they would like to live. There are equations that never amount to the same answer, water drawings which are made from tears. Some pieces are written with nothing but zeros. There are stories that can never be spoken even if broken by glass.

In one drawing there are guns holding up a house.
There are other doors—but this one is closing in on you—look, a child points to a page that has your name written beside a lion whose giant mouth and teeth are closing in on your face, and you watch as the child translates for the lion: sometimes the wind won't stop dragging the branch back and forth along the fence, half outer bark, half metal bruise, and what should be straight is bent.
The story is not the branch or the wind, but the chain-link fence whose barbs are made to keep things in their place even if there are doors that might open away from that room.
The Leash

Sitting in the cafe window watching commuters step off the J, jogging women sprint past, slow walkers with grocery bags, I waited to see myself pass by, with Leo, his leash wrapped around his left leg, just before the intersection, and the way I lean down to unravel it, my hair falling around my face, not covering my moving lips. I cannot hear the churning rails of the J, the spinning washing machines, the man hunched over his cart at the bus stop. I am numb to the woman watching me through the cafe window and how she wonders how I could be so careless—everything going by dangerously fast—with the leash.
San Francisco’s Castro Theatre

Tonight, on the street the old fighters no longer look sideways,

they wear leather chaps showing muscular butt cheeks even in the cold,

the porn shop opens its doors to the half-numb flashing their ready-made erotica—down the street the same homeless boy holds his cup in the red light of the Wal-Mart sign, saying please, the sick come in and out of the glass doors with their expensive medicines, showing strength.

Tonight it’s a Truffaut film black and white images reflecting rapt faces like movements from day to night, last night it was the same feature someone else sat here some other man making love to the world.

Delbert Warner

I was gone for a week and the postman had to shatter your window and call an ambulance. You can’t leave.
It’s as if we were chosen to live here.
Sharing the same breeze through the pines, the same incandescent sunsets. You say this is a darned good place and fifty-five years after you left the war and bought your cabin, you never left, so I believe you.
Gray paint on your house peels away in the wind and I watch you pull the torn screen door, balancing a cane, your hunched shoulders moving solidly, without speaking, a whole history in your wake. Who else could tell me how logs can break your back, pinning you beneath a truck for hours until someone drives down a mountain road, or winters on the Blackfoot when snow rose above school windows, and how much you love your trees—or the way your laundry dries quickly in the evenings.
It is so much work for you to still be in this world.
In the early dawn I hear you feeding my dog chocolate cookies, I don’t watch to disturb your privacy, but I hear your plain old-man talk, and it hurts in my chest to picture you, leaning like a priest at communion, giving your Saint Francis hand through the fence.
Canyon de Chelly

Plantsing words, like seeds, under rocks and fallen logs—letting language take root, once again, in the earthen silence of shadow and bone and leaf. —David Abrams

I come to the edge of the stone cliff in the evening and the sun’s softness on the rock is the translation of ember in any language. The wind is rising and I look across the canyon to Whitehouse ruin. I cannot speak for the hands that built underneath that great wall. I am not allowed to imagine the small fingerprints that have been washed away a hundred times in high water. I am not afraid of loneliness in this archipelago of light. There is no one to watch me leave and make my way down the steep switchbacks.

The day I brought my students here on the bus from Chinle, they ran to the sandy bottom and threw their bodies into the shallow river as if a god had wanted them baptized.
Muddy and red from the blood color of the sand, they walked to the base of the ruin to dry.

I find a small remnant of stream and wash my face and arms.
The ladder in Whitehouse ruin has been bleached by the sun and glows a thin white in the early night. It watches me.
I am not alone. When I climb back up the canyon I look back three times and the ladder plays tricks with me.
I see a thin skeleton, an old man in the doorway of his home, and the lines of an ancient world still pointing in four directions.
On leaving the Navajo to go North For it is only at the scale of our direct, sensory interactions with the land around us that we can appropriately notice and respond to the immediate needs of the living world.—David Abrams

A strange spring:
rivers fill with dust and Russian thistle—each day the washes open like begging bowls to a sky so blue it hurts the naked eye.
Each morning more heat, more starving sheep, more empty beer cans, more bruised children. Arroyos planned by the government wash away in the wind.
Metabolic water towers shine fat bellies in the sun.
My children tell me that when they grow old they will build swimming pools in their houses.

Always thirst:
even the train’s full of desire. Union Pacific, like a habit-driven animal through the bones of the desert, rattling into a maze of shadow.
I watch the land’s dry lips curl and flake rice grass and globe mallow like pieces of dead skin, sunburned and weightless across the sand.

Clouds break and become spears, luminous and fragile. Skinny cattle are statues of loneliness at their watering holes.
I follow complicated tar patterns across lanes that lead me to believe in uncertainty.
A black buzzard like a seed in the sky, waiting, trusting the weakness of the dying, circling above me through all this border crossing.
Track

A town I once knew kept pounding itself into the prairie, boxcars filled with sign-posts birthing Main Street, Willow Avenue, Johnson.
It was the constant bursts, meteors showering bolts into the rock and coin-saloons.
It was this call for gold, this dismal slow signal of dust bringing in the morning train, suffocating the low grasses that made all this rise like mortar on a platter.

All west-facing windows, shrill whistles and wagon beats against the dusty gravel roads, I will carry. I will carry the sins of violence against whatever stood in the way of the train.
I will carry the not speaking about absence and the silences that follow rain on a blackened street where once there was no road but small fires and the softness of human feet. To carry the word, propelled forward like Billy the Kid or a history built on verbs, all that freight—the wind moving clouds in a sky so large it could never disappear. I carry this weight because my land is crossed over with appetite, that roaring heart of steel on the tracks.
Violation

After the Medieval practice of burning a home if a woman was raped inside its walls.

The village has prepared for this. They are walking with baskets of fire underneath their clothes. The cove of kitchen is no longer green. Her pans hang as if they know what hands unspoke and tore away. Her calico and grease against the body. No figs in the bowl and the pitcher is not empty, but each window full of the steps towards her. We cannot be free of diminished distances, even with waves washing salt against the panes. When the house falls it will be as the body, nailed to a pillar, falls. As star becomes cinder, and so swiftly is erased.
Estuaries

The boy who lays the rabbit on the table and watches his grandmother skin and pound it until the bones are broken and the body is made unrecognizable knows to pay attention to the pelt's strange emptiness and the pounding which is not the pounding of his own heart and the blood spilling across the wooden table which is not the estuary where the river invades the sea.

Upstairs a girl listens as her grandmother unfolds the shutters. The river moves quietly but she has forgotten how to hear it.
Her body has stopped growing and she wonders if she ends there.
Outside a planet has just fallen behind a chestnut tree.
She dreams of the world beginning and ending and just before waking she stands alone in the alley and watches the gardener water his ground while two hundred and twelve people raise their voices to sing for the dead inside the village church.
Cathare Ruins

This afternoon, chose to walk quietly, a ruin, a stone no longer a wall, over whose shape I climb in search of a key-hole.

When you boarded the ocean liner and held the rails with olive gloves, the waves and people motioning from the pier, signaled a becoming, a past from which some things cannot be retrieved. The sky a temple, ceiling vertical to nothing, clouds a skeletal body, four pillar absence, a sentence running away from the listener, this blueprint, a voice lining the absence of a house, falling back in the same direction, motion of rain, (yellow umbrella), sloping off the stones, a window heaved inward. And there is no need for recovery, the boxwood has grown confused in the rain, blocks of home continually the size of shadows where the village stood, stronger for the one who traveled alone across the sea, something in her blood hushed by that distance.
Semantics

Present in our utterance is the world: small particles of rain on the window, there, as you think of what you are in two languages or the glass with yellow leaves on your face as if you are always walking through a storm of images.
On Swan Mountain

They are in a hurry.

   Bridges of leaves fall into the river. It doesn't matter that I am a human figure walking as everything else also moves toward a final destination. My words only part of the yellow light there on the trail and the profusion of fireweed only pieces pulled from white rocks (the picture changes with the wind). Near the edge of the trail he is all I want, and becomes the words we don't have for the wholeness of fires in the pines and the rains sweeping afterwards.
If there were windows in the room and no needles to rise from, we would not hurry but the mouth is the world opening as the body opens, a pale center, calling after what language cannot say, never close enough to petals holding the world yellow as the mouth tries to say what is quiet about leaves falling like salt in the bodies of the living as if the world was his mouth opening and salt on the skin of leaves falling in a pale light until it disappears the way absence is alive on the branch.
Distances

Only the bells on the mares far away, chewing on grass along dark banks that held back the Pacific-driven Flathead, the river that fed the Salish, before the first expedition of white men changed the history of your blood-line.
Unlacing your heavy leather boots in the lantern light, I could hear the sounds of two rivers flowing into each other. Dogwood leaves fell into reddish mud, and the woven curves of the wind moved against Turtle Mountain. I remember the strange smell of smoke on your chest, the gentle slope of muscle where I could hear a heart beating.
You had a scar on your shoulder, raised and streaked like blades of grass. I wanted to ask about the accident, the sounds of horses moving through trees as they walked towards the meadow.
Manifest Destiny

But right here it is just you coming home from the mountain. You are always quiet when you return and out of politeness, wash before you kiss me. I made a pie. (Can you feel the heat from the stove?) and you kiss me (shaven) and your smell becomes the whole world returning, from which nothing of this scene can be omitted (yes, the peaches are fresh, I chose them by hand and peeled them with my knife, see the yellow skin on the cutting board—) I am asking you how many aspen leaves across the path, larch needles (falling now), how many shots, a final center, a direction I wish I could stop the wheels for. But as you un-pack your knives and sweaters I recognize we are left with a shoreline of moving docks (you are now speaking about the ride in the dark and the horse moving towards me) hip bone against hip bone, breath tossing through the night—a frontier, a dream of distances: some meadow where we stay.
A Rustling

When the postman passes I watch how he believes in the words he deposits, believes we are not so alone in our languages, believes we are still holding each other under the roof while the rain slopes and quivers to the ground.

You lean, and move your arms above your head, (letting a yellow shirt fall to the rug): I watch your body become whole, (bare knees) a charge of leaves blown beyond (window) and I cannot collect you. I watch leaves shudder in the cold, shudder and move away. I cannot see them leave. In the morning it is all bare rain and I reach for you across the pillow. Don’t wake you. Don’t touch ear or hand. Don’t go for the mouth. Do not begin there (inside), just listen to the rain. You rise up and do not begin there (your skin) you rise up and the rain keeps the sky quiet. Begin (again): I hold you like a blown leaf. I hold you into my mouth.
I hold—— yellow against a wall, blowing (again), a history (of) rustling.
Letter

Charlie Parker played while you showered, and I listened to the water knowing its way around your body. In it, there is breath and a world of notes, smooth and bare again. But tonight you are quiet and have given me no chemin dans un pays perdu.

I am asking to be more. Open as a word in the back of the throat, a small guttural feeling meant for the outside, a bridge. Who says that language has no body/wings, little units of sound like a thimble moving against a needle, finally landing just within the frame of your window, birds, (so still) this evening. And what is the difference between the lily flower and the water that keeps touching you in my house with the porch light a small humming and the dust from the horses hooves and the salt from their bodies and the blood from the animals you quartered washing from you as though in that water, away from the mountain sides, there were words finishing on the page.
Writing on the Flathead Indian Reservation

Because now you are in the field with a view of the sharp-edged range, and the man beside you, whom you love, carries a portion of this Salish ancestry, some things must remain secret.

You listen as the Jocko river and the wind through the pines make inhuman sounds—which are willow leaves and the hum made in sunlight and the bee eating flowers—here in the light, day washes over a thousand needles.

Because here under the mossy rain-drenched meadow, in which I write,
there are objects buried underground:
a water pitcher passed from one valley to another, a stone bowl a mother used to pound corn.
They are hidden in the earth the way blood is quiet in the body.

Because a story without pages can still sing, you listen,
there are birds shaking from branches, seeds, air-borne and rising, on the wind.

Before you were here this field had a view of the mountains and in the field, with bear grass to his knees, a young man without traps, without a gun, stood watching a deer come out of the pines, almost without sound, almost without fear.
The Triptych (with people passing)

Shadows along the white walls pass faintly across the triptych, caught for a moment against the frozen scene:

as if in passion the maiden into the vagaries of horizon. A blue frock. And underneath—perhaps, a birthmark, darkening in its hidden disorder, a splatter on pale skin. Only the panels on either side indicate the limits of space. Moment by moment she is an unseen horizon. Lingering there, spread, her body and its perpetual desires. Now the museum goers lean forward, as if celestial, resurrecting breath from her mouth as church bells flex their ample sound to mark the seventh hour of morning— until finally they are fixed shapes again in a room of forms, back from a crossroads, the tongs of space attempting to close in upon the blue light that comes from her dress as fume and salt light against the sea. Across the city, bridges up-lift the night traffic, and workers make their way home.

Triptych (she slips out of her dress)

She slips out of her dress, steps away to the window. Yellow folds of silk gather in a pile, seams hidden.

When he lifts it off the wooden floor, he smells her body.

He notices emptiness in his arms. In the lamplight, he touches the delicate stitching: ribbon of wheat, boundary-line, fence made of smoke.
Triptych (the body filled with longing)

The clouds float north
The clouds float south

The body filled with longing has to have air. She loosens her braid, lets it weep.

Letters smell of cigarettes and wet leaves. All day she was inside of it.

She becomes the half-sister to tears. All day she was miles away from herself.

They rose and fell, hyacinths in the rain. On the bridge they moved like doves, or candles burning.

Afterwards the birds cried chick-a-dee, dee, dee instead of his voice.

She left a bowl of apricots in the rain. They kept coming back, singing below her doorstep.
L'Église

Through the archway into the chapel— a dampness like the touch of a palm against my face. Dimness like the weight of ashes, a mineral light, condensation that both smolders and lifts-off into the nave. Alone in this century's erasures.

We have gone so far into exile—two candles burn. What I pray for cannot———, (did I speak?) they will glow, a silent theater, until nightfall.

Here the sleeping village rested. Here, a whole world of saints down from the cliffs, faces pale from clay and rain. An ancient aria seeping through a language we no longer have words for. It is no longer a body holding up the altar but the eyes and their wooden sadness, a color beyond the sea more silent than a photograph. Everywhere stones, and windows too tall to see out of and I want to console something of the abandoned here.

Voices

_I no longer trust my own life, you say_ through the telephone. The world outside drips with rain, black soil turning to spring mud, bare lilac trees glistening with droplets. _It’s hailing_ in _Eugene and I’m alone with the cats._
I tell you it is okay to be sad when it rains.
Wait for the first opening, the blue entrance of light. _I can’t believe it, you say._ In your sadness you become every woman as she dresses in front of the mirror, wondering how to hear over noisy street sirens and what to eat when there is so much death falling from the radio. Into silence I recite Sappho before you can stop me _once again,_ _limb-loosing love shakes me, bitter-sweet,_ _untamable, a dusky animal_ even though I know you have never believed that language can heal us. That night I dream over and over of Greece, of rocking inside our boat, white sails full of wind. I remember voices whispering beautiful and fragile things to love about the world.
First Frost

First frost, skim of crystalline stillness, blades leaning toward the inevitable— my dog’s crashing through the red and yellow groundbrush, chasing his visible breath, everything caught at the edge. All I see is the unraveling of leaf-matter, nakedness of my hands. Leaves, flushed, fallen—it’s as if my animal understands this, coming through the bramble of heightened color, carrying his prize. His instinct as constant as geese to their nesting ground, just as fighter planes curve toward their target, he runs to me holding a kingdom in his jaws, his black coat radiant, moving across the fractured earth.

He drops the deer leg at my feet, severed below the hip-joint, hoof a perfect smoothness, hair almost the color of skin. I am struck by the arc, the yellow bone and sinew. Severed from the body, it becomes a young birch stripped for kindling, my own pale arm.

Here’s enough to hold the pillars of Jerusalem, here’s the strength to jump barbed-wire.
The Horses on the South Fork of the Flathead River

In the river we see our horses reflections, two brown manes facing away from each other. They seem to float from the river, toward the white cliff face where the idea of a wall becomes more than what holds us here.

For the horses, this does not change what it means to stand inside a river.

We can see what it is to be water underneath a body filled with light. Leaves float over us and the two horses continue across the river. On the mountain in the distance there is a thin line of snow.
Red Leaf

A storm blows in. You are like a lost leaf and let it take you. Not speaking about two countries, you know more than to say the word (exile). But it lives like geese always moving in opposite directions, without power to stop leaving. Clouds come down and you wonder about penance (la cathédrale d’Albi, demons out of flame) and homelessness. You watch the darker ones leave and return. You see the sky open and hail on your garden, breaking flowers, but it passes and you collect green fruit with your hands. Storms never stay. You are a lost leaf and let it rush over you.

You are a leaf that has fallen and asks the wind to leave it there, by the schoolyard, in the palm of the child who will write a story about the red leaf—how it blew in from a village garden, smelling of the sea, having moved above blue waters like an albatross, wanting to go back and wanting to leave.

Winter Storm

To live as if nothing were known of death, no world. Windows and walls holding out the storm. Even the bleat of the goat before it died, a lost note singing as it bled into our veins, and then was silent. It wasn’t just the sacrifice, it was the idea of the small carcass settling under the roots of snakeweed. Of spring and rainfall, of my own hands carrying its scent.
A bowl of blood next to a fire and a mouth moving through the smoke. I’ll never know if we always work against the world. The need for something solid keeps tapping at the heart, the obligation of building roofs, the resonance of hammer, tar, wood.
All night it falls and sings and I wonder if those who hear it feel a sorrow in their throats as though they are hearing the last song of the night-owl.
The single note giving way.
a welcoming to earth
—For Mara Montgomery Parks

You are born to a fathomless geology, your eyelid a hammer between pounding images, the petrified wood's maze of rings, or the savage frost which collapses out of an orange-flint glow now folding into night.
Your world is what falls from this early air, cold and laced with tiny crystals, what holds the heart in motion, what vanishes in these avalanches of wind.
A Hunger

There are drafts everywhere, old coffee cups, notes to call a friend, laundry piling in the corners. You would give it all away, the ache toward a vision that never lasts, the poem that keeps remaking itself as the world is blown apart in other places. After an explosion there is just death: horror. No attempt to capture what is still exuberantly blowing in the air, the fractal madness of the pines, what is inseparable about dead lilac leaves and violence. We want to die inside the poem that says everything about our life—the blazing mercuric blasts that dazzle and do not wake us from what we have been dreaming.
Adélaïde’s Twelfth Century Home

Alone in the grand hall, you hear whispers.
A long mirror reflects your own pale cheeks.
You lean in, touch the wide marble hearth, her fires fallen to a common darkness, meek.
An inescapable stillness you fight as the modern also rages against death.
Young troubadours desired her blue light.
She became steam rising from lakes, what is left after the bell tower sings, bareness like a gate ajar. I have almost lived there.
Nightfall

The sun goes down and turns the mesa to blood as it brings us night. A few miles away in the last light along the canyon rim, the jewelry sellers are turning their pick-ups toward Chinle. Their lights sweep like lanterns across the desert. Last night snow blew into the cracks of sandstone and the peaks beyond the mesa. Now the wind is picking up again. The sky darkens and the mesa bleeds—everything turns into sand washed through the body. We are turning away. We might use the words the sun has set, but the body knows it is the earth that leaves. Circling as crows might, or aircraft before war—we turn our backs. Snow from the west continues to pile below a small juniper.

History of the West (three)

I have seen ridges that trace your body through a distance I desire more.
There was dream of fishing this river and the salt water I walked across: there was a thought of falling through and pale flowers after. Coming into being with needles crisscrossing the path, the frozen air held us, firs wrapped in night-call, shadows falling away. Stars moved over the lake, and fell again, and there is no memory of the first time I tried to be everywhere: there is nothing slow in the night, no memory, only what warms us.
On Blue Mountain

Mountain ash shivers heavily in the wind. A hundred birds leaving (never enough time to know heir origins). I could sense all of this and the season's golden fire. I could sense all roads that move away in ten thousand different gestures, tar and fissures laid-out beyond the eye. Can I believe in what follows?
That at the end of those black corridors lies some kind of answer, that these small human efforts lead to the dream of a fire so brilliant you have to close your mouth.

Breath everywhere: the sky never stops widening to the far lines of the day-moon, dropping upon us with leaves so full of death that we are left only with meager sentences to honor them. How can this be enough?

This crossing from one river's slow turn to the hush of wings on a bridge-wire, an ecstatic line that reaches from the particular; needles that point away from the sky: script hidden under the snow: blue filaments in the night.

And what I could say there. Say with a whole basket of vowels, the copper labor of the fields,

Queen-Anne's lace crocheting a grammar so full of quiet that I am filled with variations of the only word that means birthplace, heaviness, sewing, and at this hour. By staying here there is no sum and substance of the sea, no great horizon. Essences are scattered and fossilized in the ground. Salt moves on the mountain, elk and deer linger there, tongues remaking the memory of their origins, each atom echoing backward, asking us to feel how far back we lean, how we can almost be made alive, full of wind and verbs, shelves of marsh-salt and the smell of rot between the heart’s beating, between the delicate submission of hill-grasses and your own veins, their brightness pulsing.
