Demolition of the Sky

A. J. Collins

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarworks.umt.edu/cutbank

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Let us know how access to this document benefits you.

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://scholarworks.umt.edu/cutbank/vol1/iss69/8

This Poetry is brought to you for free and open access by ScholarWorks at University of Montana. It has been accepted for inclusion in CutBank by an authorized editor of ScholarWorks at University of Montana. For more information, please contact scholarworks@mso.umt.edu.
We'll never run out of boxes for this bunch of
From the west comes the ring of an egg snapped on the edge of a porcelain bowl.
Fissures craze above the Pacific, but the waves tongue along, up from the ocean's invisible floor we mapped with our echoes. We read the almanac and harvest early, worrying about the questions our children don't ask. There's no such thing as a shy god. We tear down the night's bestiary to keep our lovers from being eaten. When we wake to find their side of the bed huge and ghostly, smelling of them—tomato stems and gin—we roll onto it, pressing from the absolute cotton the wide specks of each desertion, the wilderness another person's silence demands we expand.