1981

Getting It Straight

Laurie Lamon

The University of Montana

Let us know how access to this document benefits you.

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarworks.umt.edu/etd

Recommended Citation

Lamon, Laurie, "Getting It Straight" (1981). Graduate Student Theses, Dissertations, & Professional Papers. 2452.
https://scholarworks.umt.edu/etd/2452

This Thesis is brought to you for free and open access by the Graduate School at ScholarWorks at University of Montana. It has been accepted for inclusion in Graduate Student Theses, Dissertations, & Professional Papers by an authorized administrator of ScholarWorks at University of Montana. For more information, please contact scholarworks@mso.umt.edu.
COPYRIGHT ACT OF 1976

This is an unpublished manuscript in which copyright subsists. Any further reprinting of its contents must be approved by the author.

Mansfield Library
University of Montana
Date: 1981
GETTING IT STRAIGHT

by

Laurie Lamon

B.A., Whitworth College, 1978

Presented in partial fulfillment of the requirements for the degree of Master of Fine Arts

UNIVERSITY OF MONTANA

1981

Approved by:

[Signature]

Chairman, Board of Examiners

[Signature]

Dean, Graduate School

6-1-81

Date
GETTING IT STRAIGHT
Many thanks to the editors of the following magazines in which these poems appeared:

GiltEdge, New Series: Hearthstone; In One Of Your Movies A Woman Exits Laughing

The Montana Review: Night Shift; What You Meant, Passing Each Station

Cutbank: Last Gray Scene; Leaving Emelia

The Seattle Review: (forthcoming) For My Father You write you're learning to detect slim birds offshore at Coronado. Their heartbeats catch you crawling after tides, a run of hands along the edge of clamshells. Hotel gulls stutter toward loose pickings on the lawn.
From Monterey, three photos of dead seals, their mouths blown out like sudden drums, a tire flowering toward the ditch at 95.
Natives bring you jokes of hungry tourists, a thermos of black coffee. You have relief flown in like Portland roses. The sun wears half your arm.
"Birds know how to keep in touch, sky and weather charts remote. Watch out for dogs in mean weather. It is not easy"— your advice sent back like postmarks from the town you threaten to expose.
My best stars point you in the wrong direction, clots of purple nettle and familiar landstones. In your private field, sinewed cattle stride long shadows toward the barn and evening troughs of needled water. Rain and dogs mean don't come home. They wheel dark waves from the sea.
For Your New Wife

In one of your movies a woman plots her story and goes down beating the air with knives.
Geese cripple the river with stone eggs.
On the lawn, guests collide with sandwiches bitten to the shape of startled mouths. They could be your children the way they point to one another, the way light travels their clothes for money and petals of gardenia they have slipped, unnoticed, into their pockets.

Far off, a horse drowses in his yellow stall. A train crosses the border into Switzerland.
You get out at the wrong station, this one full of snow and girls with real hips the way you dreamed it.
In a window the woman who plays your new wife arranges her almond hair.
Hands full of citrus wave and wave from the street. You tell her the lemon-hearted moon tracked you to the river until dawn.
Landlocked

It's how you wait in the red housecoat, sleeves rolled up past floury elbows and the bowl of steamed rice. Your tribe is small at the table, slim hands passed down to the youngest tossing chicken bones in the dead ring of his plate. Sabbath.
They bless bad food by tasting air like teeth. Chowder tilts against lip and spoon and the window waves back at your face walking out of it. Saguaro blossoms unravel the chest of your husband's newest sweater. You imagine yourself in Miami with oranges and a bag of cooked rice. For proof, you point to the rind of your heels. You say,
"I could use a vacation. Be quick about it."

At the beach, sky more gray than family.
A gull rages beneath his wings under water.
Your husband's chest swings open: no one is astonished by the stone weighed between his ribs, or that the black and white shutter refuses to close. The children salute.
You swim backwards predicting tides, the star thinned back to zero. On the shore a tin of ricecakes obscures the red sleeve of your dress. Photos litter the beach like tattered feathers. In this one, the last, you've grown lovely in your own discarded clothes.
Plotting Your Historical Reunion

You could die here famous, someone's lover or relation in a town that wails six months for rain and dirt. Both sides of the street mean no one's home. You never lived here long.
You want something never mentioned on white maps, a ditch heavy with yellow cats, the room you slept in dreaming sand, a red convertible and your mother at the wheel terrifying waves and gulls.
When you woke, not your mother but an iron bed and downstairs, grinning men in baseball caps at a counter warm with soup and toast.

That dream was 35 years ago. Now go back alone. You stay in the same hotel, the window you lean from tasting dust still overlooks the trainyard gray with cowering dogs. The river bangs canyon walls with pale green run-off late in spring.
Downtown, indians avoid the man still writing home of wolves and the daughter he lost track of twenty years ago. Outside the Umatilla Drugstore, a real indian, ten feet tall, grinds redwood feathers into dust.

Some nights a mountain empties and you prod misshapen streams to give back shale, the current shot with traces of fake gold.
If wind revives one good cloud or bird that never appeared, not even for you, there's no strike here, no way to tell your laughter isn't real and those stars that flinch a hundred miles away are home. You remember kind animals, your family drinking rootbeer on the porch.
If a ghost appears, your father gives him money and he goes away. Your youngest sister follows. She's whistling war tunes, her voice soft as handfuls of old dimes.
For My Father

Eucalyptus, the sawed rose flaming, it is dawn and you rise with two hands in the dark past mirror, basin, your wife's lean voice rustling the bed like newspaper. Outside young trees grip rain and begin their own lives.

A bird flares in the shattered glass of your headlight, sheds claw, beak, indigo wings. Engine ticking, you pull off the road, the only one up for miles and going to work. You stare into your hands and name each scar and nerve because they are yours, the name given over and over: star, madrona, the memorized wafer sucked dry between tongue and grape. You remember waking at four with your father, his hands bearing milk and light, the kitchen floor where you knelt to bread and spoon, the plate of eggs glowing between you.
With soft voices, you'd carry your boots to the porch where a slaughtered deer stiffened past blood, the clatter of bones in her throat.

Entering the beanfields, breath became easy as dust gathering ore between lips, thighs, rows of thistles burning for Rachel, the woman called heart after your own. Rachel, named for the dark hair pinned and falling, the apron smelling of onions, a garden of cabbage and plum.
Rachel, who slept tasting her fingers like chalk, her blood heart floating up to the moon, the ripe thorn chanting oil and dust through curtains pure as terra cotta.
Night Shift

So early, birds dream warmer sky, dream cottonwood and ash essential gray and the only home for miles. At the foundry gate a man finishes his shift with coffee, bites hard into pocketbread filled with roast beef and slices of cabbage. Telephone lines are down, all night passing messages to the farmhouse where he imagines his wife steeping ginseng in the kitchen.
She is listening to Petrouchka and the yellow room where her son sleeps softer than cats in a bone-white sleep. The moon climbs over a hen dreaming stacks of dust on the porch.

It is time to go home, so cold you pull your cap down tight the way she made it to fit your ears, the long drive toward a river you never fish. Her hands reeled you in like bottomstone, flashed amethyst for days at your thighs. Now, cold beard, the enamelled birds at your chest call Annie, call Luke, call the porchlamp on where a bottle of milk has frozen and the hen bangs gristled wings against the screendoor. Upstairs you test warm milk with your wrist, so early you must measure each teaspoon by the drop. You watch for a moment the way your son won't open his eyes.
A rare cry assembles stray light in the hallway.

for Karl Here when it rains, mountains divide without our naming them, rain exact as slate-blue sky, or further west jittery birds and frail currents woven home to white pine, seed on the kitchen table. Today over coffee I imagine you reeling in the hard winter bones of your garden. Sour litter of blossoms, cold squash. All morning I have worn your bruises like the dust towel pinned to my sleeve.

By lunchtime the yard is raked into baskets of leaves. My husband sleeps in the room I've heaped with lavender clothes, the beaded dress worn home from a snowy wedding in March. Kathleen, remember how you polished rice between your teeth like bits of tusk?
Tossed your coat to a man you could love if his name were Bobby, if the lake would let go of your fists beating his chest like a pair of red shoes?
Nights, you dream father near the wedding cake, the daughter, stitched and pressed, twirling out of his arms across a tamarack floor. Now in Seattle, the axe-edge of a mirror and in it your hands, the bureau smelling of oil and teak. From the sidewalk your husband waves handfuls of cress and oleander.
He is wearing a gray squirrel coat. The streetcar he boards rattles out of the city. Through the window I watch you pare apples into a yellow bowl.

for Kathleen
In One Of Your Movies A Woman Exits Laughing

Inside, the barometer drops to wind sailing birds like tender fists. You make the car go faster by imagining you're still in France, the great-uncles smoking menthol on the lawn. Your suitcase smells of chocolate and leather gloves the color of your skin. Outside, those trees could be rain the moment they touch ground.

Is it enough, now the blonde hair coiled and pinned, a blue stone ticking at your throat? On your lips the name of a boy pedaling faster and faster for lessons on kissing. That white house on the corner hasn't sold. You want it yourself, the window where you ridiculed your face when Sandy died. Mama counted spoons in the pantry, cried at onions and the way things go to hell at Christmas.

Flowers burn this scene. Tess waves handfuls of azalia from the gravel driveway. Some change, mercurial as hands, keeps you veering toward the mailbox. You want to crash the hedge into a postmark flying off without you. You get out of the car instead. Angry birds repeat the color of your hair. In the trunk your suitcase implicates the man you dress for. Bullets scrape cloth buttons and the powder burn of someone's mouth against your sleeve.
Hearthstone

Stepping off the porch you're back on Diamond Street in a red silk dress, the one he carried from Korea like a loaf of bread under his arm.
Nights you held it up to a lamp, examined the fabric, noticed the seams were beginning to wear.
You remember a wedding cake sliced to resemble a heart, yellow tulips fading on the picnic table.
His mother called you brassy when you rolled back her carpets on Sunday.
There were never enough flowers.

It's different now, this travel backwards to a window full of yellow light, the table set with milkglass where you waited for his axe to swing through the door.
Winters you gathered scenes from the orchard:
a pail of apples dumped in the sink to wash, peel, boil to the color of rhubarb, the log-jam on Pend Oreille where Lizzie went down waving tiny hands.
His mother stopped calling the year he left for Alaska.
For months you dragged his name through fields of beets and snow. Upstairs, we were dark angels coaxing birds out of coatsleeves, the shadows torn down by our breathing.

If you call again today I will tell you this is my house full of bells, the frozen river we tap with sticks for ice trundled home to the cellar. Here is my straw coat, my husband's red cap snared in a drift of bones, boxhedge, rabbits crumpled with cold in the yard.
Mother, these winds are fractured. That star crosshatched above the barn rings distance small enough to believe: your hairnet looping a silver doorknob, the glass of water beside your bed.
You need to enter the dream you never remember right. Not fire in the barn and three dogs buried but Callie, bundling her skirt between her knees to ride the fence like a slow mare. You'll move the house to the lake's edge where a couple holds hands and the boat with yellow sails flutters a tiny flag. The boy you were beats waves with a stick from shore.

Under the dark slant of a tree the dull pronouncement of dust fills your shoes, dust that never ruined a crop or smelled like rain through bedroom curtains. You want to go back with Phillip and Karl to that night when the dead made a home of the dark, when you opened your arms and the moon entered your face. Cross the street and pretend a faithless town could warm to the stranger you are. Show them your scars. Show them your medals and the wallet stuffed with hundred dollar bills.

You say the moon is a lie. No dog needed your love because the fire, the barn, were real. No one scrawled your name in the air and the only women who loved you were family. Rides in the car you'd hunch between sisters and white clouds of lavender talc. You loved the girl who wore fox to the Lantern on Saturday nights. She never smiled. Your flowers came back cold as the air you burned outside her house. You've seen that movie twice and each time you played yourself badly.

You never went back to the old place or crawled that flight of stairs on your hands and knees. Your hands knew you were never that young. You know this dream goes on like a town filled with hate: Japs, Jews, the daughters who gave what their mothers traded for silence. Find the man who said "Love, like a public whipping" and buy him a drink, then go hungry back to your room. The woman who loves you now rocks in bed to the dim clap of her hands. You tear pieces of luck from the dead drift of her stare.
What You Meant, Passing Each Station

This house full of windows, the river and fields we plough with our hands keep us sisters, mother and daughter. I must learn to speak all over again. A child at the piano gives up her stutter, the tarred shoe. At night she nails the face of her doll to the floor.

In the kitchen you sang ash scraping fat from the table, sang spoon after spoon and the long thin failure of your arms where each child slept and was wakened.

Is this what you meant? Your face crawling up to make a fist at the sun, the split tack of wings, osprey, gulls scraping each wave for spidery fish, the salted rim of their mouths. We end this frail embrace abruptly, a crash of scenery though our faces, the memorized lines, remain whole.

As if our train had entered a snowy station, you get out, a woman learning to pull herself across thin ice. Borders we cross follow like the map smuggled under our coats.

In the open you tell me again what is mine until our voices collapse and I am left shifting my weight from one cold foot to the other. It could happen this way. If I look back already another woman has taken your place. She could be my sister: lemon hair, tiny porcelain hands that wave and wave. This is the night we pass through, stone sky, the pearl dislodged from our throats.

Didn't the sky take all of it, the man you'd slash your skirts for, night after night, the room eating bowls of dust in a house no bird needing a home would enter?
Someone was always leaving: father, husband, the daughter with auburn hair who'd brush until the last pin flared like a match striking the wall.
In the papers, a woman confessed to stoning the face of her child, the child found beating her doll with newspaper.
For a moment it's true, the year a train slapped the life out of stone. You helped your husband board, measured your life by the straight cloth of his back. You watched until his face dissolved like soap and the tracks thinned to water.
At night, slamming a window with two hands, you stayed on, suddenly afraid to crawl the long corridor back from window to bed. Dinners felt the cold heart of an empty chair scrape the floor, the amen lifting fork to mouth.

Now a bird takes the empty house on its back and you bless house, bird, the mattress dumped in the yard refusing to burn. You rummage the porch for a pirate's dream of yellow brass, gold sent home to a woman's sunburned face.
Ancestors gave you this and you give it back, the scrub of rhododendron where, twenty-five years ago, a bloodied cat stumbled into your arms.
You give back the husband wiping his hands in the kitchen, the great-aunt pitching fruit trees and trunks of linen from a real train in Custer, Wyoming. You give the horse traded for blankets and food, the leaf-mould scraped from his hooves with an iron spoon. Behind you a field coughs milkweed, stonecrop. Cattle drift toward a river pounded with snails and the river's boom where you warm yourself in the foreign breath of animals. Close the gate. Ignore the boy leaning hard at the window as you drive away.
"Why should those points of light in the firmament, I wonder, be less accessible than the dark ones on the map of France? We take a train to go to Tarascon or Rouen and we take death to reach a star."

Vincent Van Gogh

The moon at your back like an old coat.
You cry this is not my life and wake to a soldier who, like you, sings under his breath and gathers the darkness around him, weather and rags, the fringe of his wife's shawl tucked under his chin. In your dream you do not empty your pockets for money.
You do not curse the shoes too small to step out of or the planks heaving with cold and the cold thumping hell out of ribs and lung.

Across the sea, the clearing you flush at dawn and step into. Olive and cypress, the stone wall where you place one hand, the other striking the stone you might speak to and enter.
Bless the shoes that wore out and were newspaper, the wads of money and the cigarette tipped with ash, passed from hand to hand on the road to Dijon.
Take up the language of shrapnel, waves flecked with cap and trousers and the star winking on and off like a broken lens.
Behind you, the twenty miles linked to a town and the guns you walked out on. Light in the harbor, at home your wife sews an endless sleeve.

She steps back for a better angle of harbor and sky, the way you crawled wooden steps to the sea, how the ship swung out of the harbor first light. She takes a coin from her purse and spits three times for the pain in her back, twice for luck and the war declared for fun. She dreams it across the sea, across the alley and fence to the house on Mathilde and the white folded napkin, the scalded cup in the sink.

There are webs of sand in the closet. There is a stone in her shoe, a spider washed up on her pillow and she dreams it, wheezing toward dawn and the clop of hooves in the marketplace. She dreams animals, mute in red air, rushing the tipped wing of the plough, now pulley and hook, now slabs of meat in her hand. From the window the harbor flutters with gulls like postmarks from Holland. She thinks the house will abandon her, soon the mumbling of weeds marching up to the gate. She must let them in, the bird snagged in the screendoor, the oxen glancing through curtains and the misery of clods summoning her face framed exactly in drifts of red hair.

She wipes the small grave of her mouth and enters the bedroom, running her finger across the stack of cards, the hatband. Even the map held up to the light cannot find you or release the loss in notes mailed from Prague, letters dragged like leather straps through her hands. She cannot hear what flaps in the harbor and rises, the stammer of terns passing. She imagines the moon is a knee scraping the hedge, a sudden appearance of cloth at the window. A flock of crows flies apart. There are shrags of lint in the needle, pins tucked between her lips. She must count them. She must count every one.
Let's say we named the child you carry from April to December, here at St. Ignatius, the cemetery good with names and Catholic.

It's why we've come, why we carry paper from stone to stone in rain the Missions brush silver at our throats.
Our voices hollow, we motion to each other: this one—this, so many. Their deaths are unspectacular as fever or the stray who follows your wrist.

Sister,
we're older than all of them, the woman who burned prayer on mission steps, then burned her home and fled, dragging her hands like an axe twice through the failure of men and crops, twice the man slapping his trousers for dust.

We want to tell the boy wrapped in a woman's burgundy skirts, tell light through his nails pared to the cutting edge of spoons, there's no love here but accidental, no saint's stony hallelujah from the river and the only fire—cattle waking from their bones under sky wrong as the torn wing of a bird and the bird, claw and feather at our backs.

Behind us, the valley swings shut.
We eat our lunch in the car because you are cold.
You want to go home where the living count what's left of wood stacked by the door, of sleeves ravelling in the closet.
When light fails we turn back toward town. An old star disengages as we shift into a last run against dark.
Bison hesitate in the moon's swerve turned against them. Their breath widens behind us, then circles back to the stamped bluff where they reappear as rock and shadow.

Our headlights swing west toward a man's dark face, the husband I've never met. He stares out the window at sky, hard pine, straightens his one good leg like a man surrounded by water kicking hard with the other.

In that room filled with light and the smell of garlic, he's hungry without you.
Water runs over his hands in the sink.
The egg he cannot eat, hardens.

Here, silence falls between us, the host on the tongue shared in memory and the yellow room where we locked hands and slept in each other's warmth our first seven years.

Mile after mile of darkness I watch you travel that ladder of silences to the pair of hands that was father, curled under the roof's slope as the eaves nailed his breath to each corner of the house.
He'd clasp the soles of his feet with a curse for the blister and nail, for the sweat washed like a pearl from his eye.

Mother, white in rose flannel leans toward you from the sofa.
She holds a tin of buttons for your son, the one whose face you cannot imagine, the one who begins your story each time your hands, arranged carefully as the red buds of your dress, float up to the mirror to tell it.

At the root of this dream I watch the boy you carry like a book of hours tucked under your coat.
He weaves his fingers through the wiry spool of your head. He kisses your hair like a skullcap.

At the edge of my vision he is leaving both of us out. His glance passes through you like the struck face of a deer you glimpsed once from the car.
I remember the hooves flew up like water to meet your hands begging father to stop, to go back.
You wanted to lie there in snow, astonishment pulled through your skin like a nail.

I take your fragile wrists, heavy with water you do not carry for yourself. It's for Matthew.
I tell you, they're better than we are, those behind us held buoyant in nets of dust, the dead whose names you've collected like spillwater.
Marian, they matter. They mean to take us in.
Leaving Emelia

Two sons, your husband gone, you shake the seam of your dress and lie down with the Bible, the comb, the glass of water beside you.
You search the bed for hairpins, for the lean man who braided your hair in the dark and the hands that held both sides of your head, both razor and soap at once. You hold the burnt edge of your breath and ask, where is he.

In the next room
I wake from the ten fingers of sleep to the sound of a train rocking through badlands, the sky, an absence of cinders already baked and eaten, a landscape of stars and horses locked in my fist.
Remember the night in Chicago you took me into your bed, crooning the world like a bad map of my face?
There are hands
I have not praised enough, behind me, distance I never touch.

Morning, the hoarse cry of quail, an old dog's death nails itself to the house.
You brush the hair from your neck and call for bread, pears, for the daughters, Joyce and Lydia, for nothing of darkness in the yard hammered with light, for Joseph and your sons in Albany who bow their heads, forgiving themselves again and again.

This is my leaving, denial fixed in the heart's soft beat and the blue flame of the stove, in your name, Emelia Sophia that invented a home and the fear that was never a home.
Even now it passes between us like salt shaken from hand to hand, once for your sons and daughters silent as guests, once for this faith in the odd bones of my face, and the moon, creeling with light, counting itself among them.
Bad Heart

At last we are all here, stepping with our luggage onto the braided rugs as if for a three-week holiday.
Here is my brother with his family, my sisters identical in yellow raincoats and filigree from the coast. Father, you should see how certain we've become without you.
You should listen to that soft cup of bone, mother's voice hushing, calling us each by names we've moved away to outgrow.

Here are the photos we've taken without you.
This one, mother, the wife you called Rosa, meaning, perhaps, you loved the way she slept on her side, her mouth slightly open as if ready to speak for you, to eat your meals if necessary. In the dream where she is the one whose fist follows your back through the garage window, no longer able to assemble your failures neatly as neckties, she blunts her teeth against your chest and wakes, ready to walk out of there, and sleeps again.

You think it ends here between rain and breath, the pulse that keeps you sitting all night with a deck of cards, your bathrobe knotted across your chest like a shoelace. Your hands no longer warm you in darkness that stops in another room at the bureau, lavender blouses folded in tissue. This morning we watched you grope for the lightswitch in your thin black suspenders, apunishment we understand is meant for us.
If your father's voice summons you to look out the window at sunlight deepening in eucalyptus, at birds clattering from limb to limb like ragged clothespins, you look away.
You ignore him and wish him back in Norway 40 years before you were born, before winter came hard with cold no one remembered hating until it came at the house, at the woman who hugged herself by the stove and would not eat, and would not rinse the blue dust of plates sliding from their hooks.

After his funeral and later, the chicken dinner, your breath still brittle as silk, you crouched by the hen coop and told me how in America he'd changed his name to Ed and made it pay, how he slept with a gun beneath his pillow like a claw he could count on.
How his hands mattered. Yours, now stupid as bricks at your side, were too large to knit bird bones or kite string, though once you braided my hair and it mattered that I was four and afraid of morning wolves, that you pulled long strands across your palm as if somehow they must add up.

You want it 1936
and nothing but Diamond Lake frozen before you, Al Gossett urging you on from the back seat with a ten dollar bill.
His sister, Francine, leans across your chest.
She taps your thigh with her nails. You look at the ceiling and her face closes around words you cannot remember because the ice gave way as you knew it would, because you were sweating and her breath clouded the glass with a scent you would taste again and again like spearmint. You close your eyes and the lake recedes into spokes of blood advancing from the heart.

In there with the monotony of each pulse you have invented a cruelty that lasts.
The last memory discarded, your own face no longer heroic even to you because your hunger for those you've left out goes on: wife and daughter, the skittery grandson whose resemblance you plant between nose and chin.
There with the smell of diesel and the lumber stacked clean, you have let each of us go.
Now, whittled down to the sunflower shells you spit blackly into the newspaper, it is morning.
We go on pulling at galoshes and hats, waiting for the cars that will carry us back to Seattle or Baltimore. You push your spine deeper into the bed and listen through venetian blinds to the dusty rattle of trees in August and think nothing, nothing can penetrate the pain, clustered in your chest like a red beet, that if exposed, would stretch blood-red and tenuous from groin to glassy forearm.

You remember a woman you lost stepping from the train in Newport and wonder if she's still missing, the almond smile of a woman you swore at 17 would save you and the woman at 50 who didn't. She too is leaving.
We are all leaving, and you, pulling the sheets up over your head, bearing without witness only what light you need, just barely get it the way you wanted.
Playing To An Empty House

You were the last to leave, battening windows, the slender limbs of fruit trees hoisted onto the truck.
Now, propped in the doorway a last time, you give yourself to possibilities you've learned to ease out of like a wound, a winter coat.

You choose the room you lived in as a child, pushing your feet into square shoes, parting your hair first on one side, then the other.

Now, no child's spoon follows its trail of milk to the bed.
The cupboard is gone where you hid from their eyes with scissors, and the doll trained to lose her head.
You remember moments more dangerous, when you woke to scraps of dissonant voices humming through flesh-pale walls, words you rehearsed at night until you knew them by heart, until, unharmed, you could walk right past.

At this window, you ask how much for the yellow drapes, the view of swallows troubling your glance with their faithful return.
How much for the terrace of sand, the pool lapping your eyes for another reason to empty and fill.

You choose the piano,
the sheets of music flying off into afternoons of sunlight.
Your mother would sit on the heart-shaped chair.
You knew her scent, mimosa trailing each dip of her arm as she turned the page.

Is it milklight that washes your hands, or the keys you play before a black and white photograph, the arched smile, your hands pressed against knees locked together.

You imagine some sobbing in the next room, mother and father whose voices waved you away, or your own, more fragile, come back safely as dust.

Later you crush your cigarette and go out in your old coat.
Across the street and the trimmed lawn, windows brush past a house where, inside, a man and woman lean toward each other.
You imagine a tenderness in the V of her sweater, the man, straining for words divided between them like air.

You begin to notice the moon follows you, an old man in a newspaper hat pulled over his eyes.
He crosses the sidewalk in front of you: a moon, then a streetlamp and spruces floating in the yard, and again a moon.

You say, "A charm,
a trick of light."

No, that was years ago in the schoolyard where your hands, now polished, trained to play anything, swung stick after ball, swung Daphne and Rheta, shrieking, the length of your arms that ached and held.

It was the field where stars rushed through your fingers.
It was the way you spread your small coat and waited for the soft bodies of animals to unfold like boxes tensed into corners. A cave.
A paw stirring the grass for the cry it would speak to.
Where We Would Lie Down

Here, this sadness between us again we shake like a dustrag then hang in the closet once more with the bucket and broom.
Where we live, our neighbor's protests of love sweep through the streets, bubble under our door like a puddle of water we barely miss, slyly wiping the tips of our shoes.

At night, we are careful to draw the shades against their murderous looks.
They want us to move. They think we don't belong the way we lug our indignations like bags of groceries from the car to the porch, certain the other is failing to hold up his end.
When you step out with the dog and your thoughtful plate of suet, they follow in twos and threes. They tell us we ought to get a divorce.

And yet, sleeping in the room dusty with philodendron, the cats fastened like burrs to our sides, my billowy gown strokes the air—the swaying barge that carries us all.
We even have visions of dying for each other, taking the other's place in line for the furnace, the shower meant to soap us down to the odor of bones. In my dreams, I am always the one left alive at the scene to comb glass from your hair, or poking at the edge of the fire, ignored by the star's six ragged points that march you up and down the wall.

Here is the coin I'd place between your teeth for the oarsman whose language you will not understand. The cake in the placid crook of your arm is the last meal I prepare, tapping out with floury thumbs what I would say differently to the tiny man and woman inside us. They're searching the floorboards, the mattress and pillows for remnants of warmth where they would lie down; the woman taking off her shoes, the man watching his luminous hands grow faint as a brushstroke. It is the moment we collect nothing of ourselves. It is the moment, animal or saint driven into the open toward the stake, the guillotine, our hair oiled flat to our foreheads, we shake our garlands and robes, we go singing.
To The Last Artful Man

Just as you say it could never happen to us, I point to the men in white suits who are crossing our lawn. Each carries a tray of suspicious-looking instruments. You say you need time to think, and go on eating your breakfast. Through the window I watch them set fire to the trees, the shrubs, now the rosebush exhaling puffs of fragrant smoke. When I open the door, one of them edges near. He says we must get out immediately and hands me a piece of paper with signatures I cannot read. I shout at you, "This is no joke," but I can see you are not listening. Already you have begun to perspire from the smell of gasoline. Even as you sit on the floor eating toast, your truculent eyebrows are gone, all of your hair is gone but a tiny patch behind one ear. Soon, that too disappears. Your mouth opens and closes as you begin to dissolve. The tiny bones of your feet strut in thin air. I gather what's left of you into a paper bag and together we drive out of the city. I turn on the radio because you have become so silent. Perhaps you are sleeping, or trying to find an appropriate explanation. "Look," I tell you, "You must understand we are not the only ones. We must decide, are we victims, or survivors?"

Now we can see the lake and the crowds of people already there. Children play happily in the water. They think they have come to the lake because it is Saturday or someone's birthday. We join the others passing coffee and sandwiches.
One of them points to a man sitting alone in the lake. We think he must want our attention the way his hat waves back and forth in the air. We hope he is someone important, an official or maybe a popular troubadour we should listen to. We can see he is very excited the way he skips across the beach, tossing us each a fish that plops, succulent-pink, into our hands. He tells us the fish are everything. We must handle them gently. We must make them last the rest of our lives.
Your Civilian Dream

You move into the attic with hopes for success and new rapport with your family. Below in the kitchen, your mother predicts hunger and doom. She smuggles in foolish messages with the plates of food you have instructed her to leave outside your door. We have no butter or milk. The house is inching toward the sea. We have had enough, the sea's terrible green pounding waves into waves. You try to remember the delicate scar of her voice that could lift your name into air. You wonder if her bones have gone bad, if the bruise that clung to her arm has dissolved. Sometimes you shout greetings to them all through the pipes. I am happy. My plans for success are ready, my new life is nearly complete.

If you stand on a chair you can almost glimpse the sea. From here it appears shaped like a heart or your children's fluttering arms as they run the path to the seawall. How do you tell them, once you rocked in the warmth of their flannel bodies, and thought, too easy, this scent of lilacs drifting toward the house. It was colder, those mornings you tucked in your shirt and followed your breath into fields behind the plow, the strap already warm with your tongue's persistent murmuring, twelve hours and again twelve, I am no farmer.
How do you tell them the surest way down, one foot in front of the other, the long slide into lupine and cheatgrass, the astral blue of tiny flowers brushing their legs.
If they could hear you, you would tell them to look at the sky, then at each other, at their hands and the angels poised there on each finger.

Because they are children and have told themselves, Everything lasts, when a star enters their eyes, light beats there and holds. But yours, when you close them, can still mistake pale light for a scene played back from memory, Poland in winter, the way a woman cried out, touching her lips for a cigarette.
You were there because the war taught you, take care of your own, and you were looking for someone, you watched through the station window as they boarded the trains, waved their famished arms and disappeared.
Even in the darkness of their bodies they must have known it would happen, their hearts torn out and fitted between their teeth, the world gone flat against their lids.

Still you think of her, the woman you wanted to save with matches and a warm coat. You imagine her face in the mirror where nightly you examine your mouth and the one drawn around it you remove like husk when it has said enough. You think of her now, what she might have taken with her when they came after supper, breaking through the glass. How gently she must have disengaged the youngest from her skirts, the one with no word for memory. She must have left her scent in the doorway, the soft imprint of her voice gesturing everywhere in corners.

It was warmer, bright as the bird clapping yellow wings at your back that morning someone dropped you off and you waved, grateful, then hurried on in your heavy boots, heavy the way smoke is when you breath it like rain with no sky anywhere, the war over and you refusing to believe it. So you hurried, roused by a woman's clothing spread on the lawn, sun cracking your skull and the metal plates you will eventually adjust to. Already you could see the horses had run away, your children would not come home from their field of bells. Your wife leaned at the gate dreaming of a move to Arizona, desert curved like winestem against her teeth. You wanted to tell her your hands were ready to distract her flesh from the ache of sleep, that you remember a fortune of cheekbones, how her letters eased translucent words: absence, love. You wanted to tell her you would buy her new shoes, exotic packets of seeds if she would only stop crying, if she could believe you have come home to save your life.