Hotel Fargo and the Gift of Long Island

William O'Daly
"Love's another departure."
Gwendolyn Brooks

We are gathered here, family and friends, beside this nuptial river that flows forever between old Hotel Fargo and the gift of Long Island, the proud and peeling murals of Gwendolyn's mecca and the operatic stars careening over Hell's Canyon and Manhattan, the lightning that sends rabbits scurrying for their dens and the thunder of horses' hooves chasing through Central Park— together we stand among the kingdoms of the infernal kings of rippling wheat and the lords of the steepled towers of profit and loss, to celebrate this union of heart and soul, joining ourselves and each other on this vertical street, where the patient groom waits in his summer suit, perspiring in awe, and the elegant bride glides with perfect grace from under the ancient banyan tree to arrive at this makeshift altar. Today, as keepers of the secret of changing light, of the key to sustained improvisation between the roots and the sky, all islands and the sistine seas, we pray that steeping green leaves speak of who maps the heart's country—we ask, after the bells have resounded among the stapled hills, why lovers must stand always on opposite sides of the rain, casting a single shadow across the sudden rim of the world; so is it metaphysics or poppies that make a good marriage last, and why do the white lilacs whisper when we, richer and poorer, curl in our beds like a question mark? Perhaps we want to know, or we may know and wail the truth in our sleep, awaking to a child's cry, the day's work, the silence gathering because we're different and the same, made of earth and our names, come to witness and hold to the other's lips a ladle of purest water—it is then, lying side by side in the radiant meadow, we greet with open arms the angels come toward us, and together learn the kiss of this yes, yes, everything I have is yours.
