Faithdancing

The late sun glances off the mountain, wincing the eyes like wind—it is good,
sometimes, to be blinded, to walk in the bleached hollow-way of shadows, nothing but glow
and self, reduced to an object in the wind, thrilling into it-- a sort of bliss, as in dancing, when I like best to close my eyes
and lean into motion and sound, the slight contact with another body, the floor and my feet too well acquainted to be uneasy with one another, and through my eyelids the light is color, not sight.

A child wakes alone in the room and guesses, for the first time, the word separate.
The next room is too far, the child cries and holds out her arms, and mother forgets to enter in darkness.
There is a moment when the light comes on that the child forgets what light is;
for a moment it is a new way of not-seeing,
a more exalted fright than the dark; then out of it the voice, the hands, the first face discovered all over again.
Though the child will drowse in arms, comforted, the recognition of solitude remains, becomes an imaginary friend, the one who walks just behind needing to be led, to be reassured.

I remember the last day of drama class, trust games on the side of a mountain in Virginia-- walking blindfolded, led by my partner then let go, nothing but light through the doubled gauze, and Peter's voice crying "Run, run!" and I ran.
I am walking now, Lord. See how my arms are open.
Ode to Knees

There are no bad knees, though they may be sneaky, scheming against you for your own good as friends do, clever knees, knee ambassadors, who know all language, from the formal front bow behind clothes to the knee-nudge from behind while prone, puppy-nuzzle, innocent and intelligent, or the more subtle cat-chin slide in the same position, affectionately making claims for the body. Knees know their way around in the dark, or will find it, explorer knees, bent on the knee quest, opening territory so you can follow in. Knees are knobby because they are doorknobs; there are two, one for each side of the door. They may be locked, or open. They are polite, knowing when to knock, for knees are social creatures. They want always to come together with other knees, they bend forward to greet them, longing for the knee-kiss, when the nose-bones of two knee-sets rub one another. The Eskimos rub noses only because it is too cold to rub knees properly. Knees are thermostats. If you keep them warm you will not feel the cold, and a breeze on them uncovered relieves the whole body's overheating. They soften when you're tired, to make you rest—they know you better than anyone, and never needlessly let you down.

When Eve and Adam were leaving the Garden, they knelt in prayer and farewell, and so they took part of everything with them, grass-juice, leaf-pulp, snake-scales, bugs, ground all together into knee-skin, and knees remember all of it, they never forget, they are wiser than elephants. Your knees want only what is best for you. They seek happiness like divining rods, which is why we kneel to pray, why we lean on our knees to reach for each other in bed or in pain—and when they encounter good knees, eloquent, sensual knees, don't they sigh and go weak?

(for Sharon Olds)
Basics of the Dance

FIVE POSITIONS, the basic positions of the feet with one of which most steps in classical ballet are begun and ended, devised to ensure balance in any position of the body.

—G. B. L. Wilson, A Dictionary of Ballet

First Position

I wear my hair up, I wear it down.
Braided is best, I think, for you to finger loose.
And which dress? Green, for my eyes? The blue is more feminine. I wish I could ask, but you would say you have no preference, leaving me to guess.

Do I exist
when you leave? Perhaps you have created me and I live only in your attention.
When I know I will see you tomorrow,
I do not dream.
When I turn to see where the wind chimes are coming from,
and I feel my skirt bell out, my whole body resonant,
I know you are thinking of me.

Your profile hurts me, I can tell your mind has wandered.
Look at me. Look at me. Smile.

Second Position

You may touch me, or not.
The fact remains. Close by your hand is a pen—write it down if you cannot say it.

[stanza break]
I will read it by fire.
Watch the smoke,
I will feed slow strips in or wad the note all at once, a sudden gush of sparks.
There will be an answer.
It is too cold here not to.

Third Position

You have hurt me so thoroughly that cats no longer come to my hand.
Bees don't follow me, even with sweet cologne and sugar cakes eaten slowly.
When I stopped to pick wildflowers, cows turned away from the fence, leaving me with shit. And the damn sweet peas wilted before I got them home.
My mother asked, "Who is this?" when I called.
The bristles of my brush fell out, the teeth of combs catch in my hair; yesterday it refused to part in the same place, and this morning it wouldn't part at all, which is why I wore a scarf, the one you pulled off with your hairy hands, kissing me to keep me from talking.
None of this is true, except the hurt.
See how you've changed me?
I lie now.

What do you mean, it's all right, you still love me. Look, I'm not the Empire State Building, you can't climb all over me waving that other woman in my face.
Listen, you want take-out, et it in the park.
Get mugged. See if I care.

Fourth Position

Let go. My dear one, I would have spared you this,

[no stanza break]
the bored darkening of thought, desire that frays along the margin.
But how can a box unlock itself? It is not my fault you lost the key. I should have left you long ago, when I thought it would kill me to lose you.
You should have died.
I would miss you then.

Fifth Position

The past seems always too recent to discuss.
But what do we talk about? I can never remember, only your fine-blown hair beside the ocean, the blue-gray shirt that so becomes you, open at the collar. Your hands illustrating some rhetorical spiral, waving a chunk of soaked sourdough not quite crumbling.

You were a danger to me until we broke bread together.
I became quite angry with strangers for wearing your haircut, for sharing that high angle of cheekbone.
An actor turned from his final bow with the same solid shrug and I dropped my program.
I wondered, if I were blessed with the nights, what I would say to you in the rough days of morning, my ugly feet sticking out from under the bedclothes, my clumsy dropping of spoons when excited.
But we ate Italian. Plums on a china plate, wet. Bread folded in a red cloth, the hot butter soaking in dark patches.
A strand of spaghetti snapped across your nose, streaking sauce, a later one smack on your mouth.
I had parmesan on mine, and we kissed over the wineglasses, cabernet sauvignon, a bad year. We hardly tasted it.
The remembrance of words fled me then, and I have never missed them until now.

[stanza break]
You set out a bottle-cap of Pepsi for the yellow-jackets, bottoms-up all around. Picnic tables, barbeque.
An apple shared at sundown.
And we were talking, always talking, fitting food in between sentences, visible punctuation.
I left a tender handprint of grease on your face once, fried chicken, or was it nachos? You said something smart, your voice soft, with the rough undergrowl of a tomcat with his mouth full of neck fur—I remember the tone but not the words.

I would like to know. Something to think about if I outlive you, lonely, poor appetite.
Or we could talk about it now, if you like.
Imagining My Life

When I die, I want to be Georgia O’Keeffe.
I’ve got no color, no style, no landscape I recognize, and I want them. I want to see beauty in a bare place, transform it with my hands, I want hands that make things, that make sense of things, the slope of mesas, bone-shapes, adobe like sunlight, flowers like sky, a red canna wide as the canvas, the color flowing in, it draws you in, you know that is how a bee sees it, an immense beckoning, come in where it is sweet, it is warm and deep, and you could die wanting to know what is beyond that flower.
I want her face,
the one in the photograph where she’s wearing black and holding a skull, the skull that’s in the paintings, magnified like a flower. She could hook her fingers in the eye sockets and know what the cow saw when it died, how the prairie glistened in the noon sun then blackened under the shadow of a wing.
I want to be Georgia O’Keeffe. When I die,
I want to know that my bones are beautiful.

(for Giles Mitchell)
Possible Self-Portrait Through the Ages as Galatea

They have made and remade me as their most secret woman—big-bellied and buttocked; languidly tubercular;
plump, with dimpled wrists;
a sharp-breasted virgin—and I have conspired in this.

I have given myself to them as raw material over and over, from clay to paper mache, as wood, marble, steel;

I have allowed myself to be entered with chisels and thumbs, to be melted and formed again, to be chipped down or built up—often wasted or botched but sometimes quite beautiful.

And the ones who study me, to whom I remain a concept, those are the worst,
because I do it for the hands—

I love their hands when I come alive for them, the little sigh they make when they are done,
they are so happy, thinking
She is all mine, and she is perfect.
Bodyscape

I already know
I will be one of those women who lose flesh—
thin neck and chest, drooping jaw-line
where the emptied pockets of cheek-fat hang,
two purse-bags midway to the waist, a last hoard slung low on the thighs.
I remember the drained profile of my grandmother, still solid around the hips, then they too showed bone.
Sparse hair, colorless as dry grass; skin that bruised even against itself, sagging in rivulets; shoulders rounded over, as the stones that jut from the low stream were worn by the water that bares them.

And I remember, a half-life ago, the new peaks thrusting from the bath-water, dark growth coiling at the mouth of the valley—I looked down upon the promised land until the water cooled, and when the water had all run out I covered myself.
Role Model

In the play that is my life, I tried casting my mother as a villain, a saint, a victim, but she is a creator, not an actor, in this production, a scene designer painting the backdrop that gives depth to the action. She is subtext for my story, the mother who gives and gives up, and I am the epilogue to hers, the daughter who took it and moved on—rather, I am the frame around the landscape of her life. She belongs in a cubist painting, a woman with her arms open at a crossroads, turning to face many directions simultaneously, a paintbrush in her hand. The scene revolves around her, and she is poised eternally, like a dancer, in the act of taking a step.
The Days of Plenty

Auntie fried my egg to a rubber raft, the way that I liked it, even after I didn’t. I still ate it.
Mam-ma made wine jelly, not sweet, except for the whipped cream and the cookie beside it, a breathless flavor never quite on the tongue but deeper—the word,
I now know, is palate.
Those were the days of plenty, when all I lacked was something else.
Even in myself I found richness, when I stepped on a tin lid and saw fat in my foot, a little pale slab of it under the blood like the rim on a slice of ham.

In the old Chevrolet, later stolen, I lay in back watching stars, guessing location by the heads of trees, the lean of turns,
always a surprise that we were home, a hand of poison ivy waving from the hedge, and Nanny waiting in her room.
She was the other grandmother.
She lived upstairs, and she had Ladyfingers.
I sat at the card table and built houses, and she gave me thimbles and tiny animals to live in the compartments, five stories, double-walled—I dismantled them card by card for the pleasure of beginning.
And that creak-song of the stairs, inevitable, a different pitch and rate for each of us: I tried to sneak by on the side, but there was no silent way to walk down and so I bounced on each step to make it shout.

Wash hung out on the back line, towels worn thin, to cloth, then gauze, towels that held light as well as water.
It was a place where things last.

The smell of hydrangea by the porch, like the taste of copper, which has a green flavor even when polished.
The ground under the faucet was smooth and slick as a frog's back ought to be but is not—I picked one up once--like purse leather, with fine channellings. The frog shot pee at me, then hopped away under the japonica.
I had my own place, out back, under the forsythia:
I slept there, years,
and no one ever found me but the cat, and the mint that crept under from the neighbor's;
later, when my mother cut it back,
the ground was bare nearly to the fence, and she couldn't understand it.

The ones I love seem always to be old, far ahead, smiling and waving back, but however fast I age they cannot wait and are gone when I arrive.
I will have to look back myself for someone to wave to,
as if I were a mirror and not a window,
as if there were a darkness behind me no matter which way I turn, no matter what brightness I follow.
The Way of Words

Outside Amarillo, you think you will never get anywhere: the grazed prairie unrolls itself, soothing, or boring, until you are grateful for cows, especially for trees, so rare they evoke form like sculpture. Then, sudden as jackrabbit, you see the full range of sky, no end to sunset. Land so open to sky should be loved. All that dust, which has been infiltrating the poorly sealed windows and dulling the windshield, now becomes a million million prisms, and the piled clouds are stained with the shade of sun, crystals in a sky-wide geode— you forget that there is anywhere you were going, that night becomes a tunnel, words seem bigger, or louder, uncertain as finding that full glass of water on the bedtable in a new motel, in the dark, alone, where is the light switch, where is the water, what if it spills?

(for Mary Vanek)
Seeing the Elephant

A scruffy summer country fair, humid dust stirring.
The gypsy man with a walk like dance said, "You want to ride, little girl?"

My legs stuck out straight as sticks on the back of the elephant-- skin the leather of work gloves broken in, heart bigger than my whole head.

The large slow lope moved my hips in a figure eight. The man said, "You like that, yes?"
I nodded, holding on--I was afraid and did not want to stop.

Nothing stops the elephant of my dreams.
Riding over the hill, and down, and on, and on.
On the Porch—Denton, Texas

Let us live the slow way, watching the light while the rail-posts shadow us with lengthening stripes.
The hours have their own momentum, a pace logical as cloth.

Fossils from a local creek, and stones from travels, unpolished.
Cowskull, cholla skeleton.
An oak stump, nearly sculpture, where a glass leaves rings.

No more movement than to lift a wet glass.
Skin glossed with sweat-- cool shininess
like a mirror glancing back at the sun.

Let us turn the rule of time to pleasure: the hours measured by design, tailored for fullness.

Taillights blaze and dim on the west horizon avenue.
A wasp returns to the stump and enters it, filling the hole where the heart was with roomy paper, making itself at home.
Sunday Lunch in Ponder, Texas

All the waitresses who knew us had gone.
The owner glared at television, where grainy players rushed from end to end.
The fan stirred grease smoke and dust.

Hot pie crust, cotton-candy meringue on dark chocolate; hamburgers seared to hold in the juice and rolls browned on the same grill to resist the juice—the cook was the same but portions were smaller.
Still plenty.

We ate in the car with windows down, watched the rambles of sky.
On the radio, the hop and squeak or a country fiddle.
In the tree of thorns, a swallow—scissortail—the crossed feathers longer than its body.
Far off, a cropduster's loops drifted, gauzed, captured purple—sun going down.
Rainwind, promising.

A striped butterfly settled on his hand, fanned the meat smell. He let it stay as long as it wanted. I remembered once I pointed to a butterfly and it laid the soft trust of its body-weight on my skin.
He said it was a blessing.

I placed my fingertips lightly on his thigh for the ride home.
Transparencies

The girl on the plane looked like my murdered friend when we were fourteen, alike as pigeon and dove.
(For many nights, a knife-hand broke through the window, my name hissed, voluptuous, by the stalker;
that is not how it happened, but how it could have happened had it been me instead. At last a phone call to catch things up, she said, "Why don't you move to New York?
We can rent a place together," but I remembered she was dead, and woke.) Beside me, there were black footprints on the wing, the word Adidas repeating until, midway, they doubled back two steps and disappeared. When the landing flaps opened, the runway showed through the wing.
Here is my reflection in the glass door at night, blurred by the screen behind it.
Close enough.
Les Fleurs du Mai

Where is the man in the white car, fiddling a sonata from the radio?
He is not alone, except in himself, where the music has stripped him to solitude.
He gave me the ash of flowers, sealed in a clear column, crystal, rimmed with silver.
I have learned to love gray as a primary color, lush and glamorous as film noir:
the emptied lamé gown,
the undertone of strings,
and the fade to shadow is consummation.
I have learned the grain of shadows, they are not flat,
they have life,
they are generous—
in a house full of shadows there is always room for one more.
The music lingers on on the radio, some swift concerto.
The violinist climbs, alone, one step at a time, then tumbles down farther than where he began;
they let him fall, then join in to mourn, a sweet, hypocritical theme circled and plucked by strings.
The vase sits in a high place, untouched.
The flowers grow, even through glass, the blush of dust blossoming to grime, buds of dirt almost open—the gray does not fade, and so he loves me.
May Day in Vermont

What does what it should do needs nothing more.
The body moves, though slowly, toward desire.
We come to something without knowing why.
—Theodore Roethke, "The Manifestation"

1.
In this desert hour, I resist green and hold back spring with my will.
It rains, and remains cool.
The marble sidewalks buckle in mud, weathered as gravestones and slippery. A woman reaches from her doorstep for a pale tulip
the color of cream
that has risen there.

I can see clear to the mountains from the window, through all the raised and crossed boughs, new leaves barely unfurled, no more than a red glaze with veins,

and the white wounds of limbs, snapped and unsocketed—they could not bend enough—are bright as flags on the battlefield.

Here, the most north May of my life, having fled everything pushing toward confusion, dangerous turns in the road obscured by green,
I make my last stand.

Someone entered my dream, kissing and probing my thoughts—how the earth must feel when hands plant seeds.

[stanza break]
Steps, I thought, in the overhead room, rapid, and so loud
that they drummed through me, jarring the bed,

but above me was the attic and the sound was my heart, hollow
as a promise, which,
by definition, must wait to be filled.

Above the slow stove,
where the water rocks the kettle but has not yet boiled, dawn,

the milk bottles in the window clotted with dust.
If they were mine, I would wash them, giving them back to the sun—all dirt is ancient,

but light, that endless traveller, is always young, passing through old and new transparencies alike, the messenger of reflection.

At the right moment, prisms, the light breaking through into colors like spring.
Variations on a Line From a Short Story by Richard Ford

A light can go out in the heart, quick, the lamp chain snapped at the socket, or embers sinking into afterthought.

In the doorway, the spill of light makes her a shadow, like the heart of flame.

The night is a moth that burns into dawn.
Her heart goes out to the light, never alone—a dark witness in the wings.

Light-hearted, she goes out.

The man sits in the house, patient as a mirror in the dark.

He has no heart to make light, having learned, too late,

Shots From the Best Roll of Film

Prickly pear in bloom and a hand-built chair splintery as fence posts, a lizard doing pushups by the door.

On Paisano Road, the blur of two deer.

Sun shafts between sycamores, roots holding stones out of the water-- where he and I waded in.

What we called Hippopotamus Rock, side-hollowed limestone eye-deep in the swimming hole.

What looked like frayed rope but was a snake skeleton, flesh unravelling.

Cactus in a crevice of tree like a thorned bird’s nest.

A white-painted iron lawn chair, rusted, captured in the sandbar pile-up.
We posed for each other in it.

A deer pelvis, small as a hand.
I looked at him through it—a bone mask, stained green and faint-edged crimson.

Ripples cast shadows of color on our skin while fingerling minnows mouthed our knees and thighs.
We were charmed. That was when the camera fell in. Nothing was ruined but the film.
The Ending

Even before touching we were like lovers of long custom reunited, surprise in the familiar; the whole afternoon had that ironic already-known feel, like a wood stair-rail polished with use, holding on and sliding the hands often in the dark--

I felt the switch go click and desire came on.
I could talk to him with my bare hands,
I could walk in a kind of dance,
I lowered my silk voice. Then I was terrified, I saw the other men were sides of a single coin, and this one was the coin;

once spent

I would have nothing left.
How to go on, then, with the inevitable?
It was all part performance.
I imagined feeling beautiful-- a flattering transparent mask, an austere and sparkling opulence.
I made the moment worth regret.
Windcool air,

the scent of limes cut earlier.
Dust, stirred and exhausted, glittering as it spun down.
Recognition

There are two faces I look for in a man, the Shaman and the Clown.
Large-gestured and quick-motioned, they are not opposites.
The Shaman swings his slow gaze and makes fire,
he kneels at the hearth;
the Clown snatches a brand and runs through the dark.
When the Shaman walks, the Clown follows, but cannot match his stride and so mimics it.
The Clown is the shadow of the two.
The Shaman gives weight to spirits and the Clown lightens them again, for he is more afraid and laughs aloud.
The Shaman says "Give," and the Clown "Share," and there is a time to give and a time to share.
They will not shake hands.
They raise no weapons to each other, for neither wins without the other-- the land is a woman who loves them both and will not choose.

If animals, they would be Bear and Horse.
The Bear must lie down and live with his dreams, while the Horse dances through winter.
The Bear stands up and falls down, he leaves his mark in a high place.
He will eat what God sets before him, but has a taste for sweets.
The Horse is noble, and a thief-- having no hands, he wants more to hold.
The Horse is the clown of the two.
He circles the fence endlessly seeking an audience.
He is vain of his long neck that cries out for a hand.
The Bear cries out alone.

[stanza break]
If plants, they would be Mesquite and Rose.
The Mesquite can root in poor soil, it grows according to the water, but it will not be moved;
the Rose does not object to an honest graft
now and then.
The Rose is the sharper of the two.
It purses its lips,
budgeting its beauty into kisses of color, hiding its briars behind three-gathered leaves.
Its reputation rests on potential, lavishly fulfilled
under certain conditions.
The Mesquite throws beauty into thorns, and lets the thin wealth of leaves trail through its fingernails.

If tools, they would be Ax and Knife, for both can cut
and are no good when dull.
The Knife is the crueler of the two,
for it need not cut deep.
It can carve or stab in one motion, it can pare skin or ribbon cloth, it can fly to the mark.
It needs the Ax
to touch the heart.
The Ax cleaves to the core of things, that is its sole function; it opens the marrow of wood swiftly, with innocence.
The Ax says "I am," and the Knife "Perhaps."
The Knife uses guile, not force.
It lends itself more easily to sorrow.
A Nice Face

I wanted a face that calls out across the ages like that woman in the book of pioneers, her hair swirled up in a simple crown beside the mud cabin-- I named her Helen, wondering if she were blamed for her beauty, for some unsettled quality, as the land she stood upon lured men to wander for the sake of possession.

My face has the antique look of a permanent address that was not:
the face of a dead sweetheart, or somebody's mother when young,
the one who would have listened if she were alive,
who would understand-- a face that seems to beg to forgive if that is the cost of love.
New Year's

Limbo is hell's actual location.
—Mary Vanek

Snow glittered like sugar in a glass jar.
The window hung with ice.

What has he done for me except increase my capacity for regret?

Limbo is a narrow threshold, the cage
where a door meets its frame.

I wondered how to unhinge from him as I should—

but not right now, blood relacing muscles like threads of green under snow, the moment open like a lens.

Icicles dripped sharply in the sun.
The undersides of my breasts felt hollow, filled with light,

I could feel the stems of my nipples all the way back to my ribs, as if the bone sprouted clear through to skin.

Relief felt like happiness.
I knew I would suffer for it.
Scissors, Paper, Stone

There is love I remember as a kind of madness, though when I was in it it seemed a bright, sensible place, an advanced kindergarten where I was happy, cutting out warped hearts and knifing them into beauty—heart lace, individual fading flowers. But I am beyond all that now, in my dark kitchen, slicing the peach gone brown near the stone. Bending over the sink to bite the soft red hearts of strawberries.
The Man of My Dreams

1.
Her veil was clear cellophane, opaque with light.
He did not lift it when he kissed her.

I watched her suffocating.
I wanted him,
and part of me wanted her to die.

As the flame calls to the moth then dodges on the wick, afraid of being smothered by cinders,
   his face
is turned away,
or shadowed, or too close.

The quality of light has changed:
   the sun
is an old saw, well kept;
it cuts both ways,
going in and coming out;
it lies sheathed in darkness, as dreams come slicing from the velvet nap-- and the colors are not the same.

For me they have changed. For me, the colors have diminished-- he has turned his face from them.
He has changed me,
for I no longer fear change but the lack of it.

3.
He was kneeling beside me, naked, his hand on my face.
There are words that come slow as the cricket struggling among stones,

[no stanza break]
the lamp—and me—caught twice in the double-doored glass, the moth trapped between them crazy with light:
I told him, "I don't know."

"You will," he said,
"I promise,"
and kissed me
so my whole body knew it.
The kiss was airless, like death, I tasted sweet shadow in his mouth--

I remember the deep hollow of his backbone, his mouth that kissed
in slow acrostics, so I woke puzzled.

My head
heavy on the pillow, a skull-shaped stone
under my eyes, imagining

the shape we made not coming together, a splayed fist,
the fingers
knotted and untlying,

and the sound of coming apart,
an aspirate hiss
like ripped cloth,

the sound of dry flowers lifted from a vase
and dropped in a bag with crusts and soiled cloth, the butterknife across burnt toast-- kissing me with cinders in his mouth.

[section break]
5.
I dreamed I saw him stand on a snow beach where the geese once walked among the swimmers; but now their noisy arrows grew smaller, the aspen shook their paper hearts, yellow and letting go in the wind.
Did he know I was watching?
He turned his face halfway into the sun.
A bright mask, changeable.
He could be anyone.
Ambiguous Love Poem

How sad I was to give up on you. But I go on. I love you because you remind me how alone I am. No one else consoles me like that. I would never have known how great a gift connection is—I was like the man whom fever robbed of time: his wife returns after an hour and he sees her for the first time ever again. And again. What joy. To love as an infant loves, enchanted by a smile, a voice, the touch of one finger. I would have settled for too little, had you spared it. The small hope is hardest to renounce because it seems possible, poor sparrow of desire, wrung and discarded below the kitchen window. A jaybird screams from the roof. The tea-kettle shrills up into silence, that invisible realm painful as steam, which turns to water on my hand, wiped across my forehead, cool, like a blessing.
Going On

Across the path is a fallen tree scalloped with fungus, a footstep sunk into it,
but first,
treacherous, a living root curves up like a rung for someone climbing the trail or a ceremonial arch for squirrels, and the old wood rises up, breaking the fall.
Prickle of mild splinters, chicken-fat richness of rain and soil and the sweet powder of mold still settling, constellations of baby spiders spinning over the log, birdcalls——
even at the heart of the pavement there is a spiderweb bowl holding grapes of water and sucked flies,
and small birds are singing, a treble in the cavalcade of ordinary noise.
They dabble and splash in the gutter pond, the water tea-colored from seeping through leaves.

(for Galway Kinnell) Say When

Say you want to move on but don't know where.
Say you want to go home but can't find it.
Say you don't want to.
Say you lived on a farm and raised hopes and the crop failed.
Say it was a kitchen garden, no livestock, just cats and their prey.
Say you were a genius of the domestic,
    spare closets, papered shelves, cans rotated in the pantry twice a year and leftovers fresh as Lazarus.
Say the dust defeated you, spiderwebs flaring on the hot saucepan; wasps droned on under the porch, the broken step you stepped over with the wash,
    the fig tree crowding the line.
Say you had a hammock tied to the tree and only Sundays to lie down and get the laundry done.
Say you lay down,
    dreams urgent as prayers,
    and the wind wound you in sheets from the line.
Say you died in your sleep and woke up convinced it was paradise. Or hell.
Say it doesn't matter.
Say you don't know what you want.
You will when it's gone.
For My Daughter

I think of holding a child in the night, and it is always you, hair dark and ruffling. Sometimes you are barely born, and my skin welcomes you against me as if, prodigal, you had returned home. Sometimes you fold your thin legs like a coathanger, too big to sit here. Always your arms are open, encompassing more than they can hold.

Little girl, you are a generous soul, for I have never tried to conceive you, and may never, and yet you come to me, already lullabyed, on those sullen evenings of wakefulness, and grace my arms with your sleeping, the long slumber of faith.
Between Actual and Ideal

Bob said, "We will all go directly from here to there."
He and I stopped on the way to buy groceries.

Tongues of basil, parsley frills, high-collared onions-- he fingered them like the buyer for a vegetable museum.

A woman said to her daughter, "Ice cream is not a vegetable."

The peaches were green.
The nectarines were hard.
But the apricots were just ripe.

Bars of chocolate, thick, entire almonds inside.
Olive oil. Cheese and butter. Wine.
Bratwurst, kielbasa. Ground round.

If half of forty people eat either one sausage or one burger, and the others eat one of both or two of one, or more, or none, how many servings are in a mustard jar?

Three carts full. The checker said,
"You must have a big family."

Somewhere between the store and Lake Tahoe the lemons disappeared--the rest was more than enough. We ate with hair slicked back; our clothes smelled of grillsmoke and the lake.

Afterwards, singing, and communion of chocolate passed hand to hand.
Passers-by looked back with envy, or smiled-- it must have looked like a reunion.

A pinecone glinted in the afternoon, a ring of resin held out to the sun, gold of light, not substance.

Someone asked, "Is that chair empty?"

We never finished the conversation.

Alone, on the porch, for a while. Small lights below and above the horizon. Why look out there for answers?
Perhaps they are scalawag stars, their temples shining with snake oil. Perhaps it is only coincidence that they seem to belong together, a community of distance—no more connected than sparkles on the windshield of a car under a pine tree.
But even stars feel the pull of moon on blood, and move in relation to the others.
For the moment, I knew where I was, framed by tree and rail, the monkey's paw silhouettes of sugar pine waving against the California mountain sky.

Patience

An old stream in Virginia where I once walked, though not alone then, the water sliding past the way it always has, the way it has to, with glimmers and small surfacings: if I were swimming, it might be worth cupping my hand—I would hold something, the illusion of movement—but here on the streambed I open my fingers and the water closes, glassy, around them, an embrace in passing.

A blue-edged butterfly landed on my shoe and drank, and stayed, motionless. Then my foot twitched, and the butterfly fell, having sipped its last. How long should I have waited? Days? Weeks? Until the colors moulted, leaves that began bright and outlasted the tree? I hurried on, taking a side path. I did not know I was circling, that all the time I was coming back.
Letter to the Future

Day breaks, but night bends.
In dreams time spans days, flexible and unsparing--

I look for you but the doors open to the past, closets stuffed with nothing to wear.

You were always one street ahead of me not slowing down.
And me, running to you in my mind even as I skipped the walk to my father, who turned and waited.

Night falls, then day aches, the shadow of dreams darkening it.
Last night in the wineglass the lamp was reflected twice, one upside down.
A red smear is all that remains of the wine.
In the mirror,
an old angle of face after all these years, a medicine unexpectedly sweet.

I remember when I was young and sorry, I lay under the forsythia wishing I dared hold my breasts like Anne Frank in her diary.
Dreaming of the unimaginable embrace of men.
Cool ground, a shaft of heat across me as the sun found the opening of branches.
How much longer now?
A Living Doll

First, the baby dolls, rose-mouthed and fat-wristed, in the bottom
a wee hole
where the water in the bottle goes, and later

grown-up dolls, smaller, as if adulthood meant being diminished, with unpunctuated breasts and no holes and great complexities of clothes, but

I did not love my dolls because they were bad, bad actors, too stiff,
their classic masks too small for tragedy, plastic women and imaginary men-- what a pleasure to discover real men, anatomically correct, with clever joints and ready-made stories, always a role for me to slip into.

See how well I can bend,
I can open and close my eyes.
Nearly Full Moon at Pyramid Lake

Over our heads at Pyramid, night-hawks flew, chasing something invisible. The air was thick with the invisible—
I felt some on my skin, where lake water was drying, the wind sucking it from me, thousands of kisses rapidly cooling.
I imagined someone touching me, far as he could reach, a sprig of sage in feathery strokes down my back as we faced each other, kissing.

We spoke into the wind, which tore the words into scraps of sound. Gulls swooped, hungry. The light that shone through the gap in the cliff, where no roots of sagebrush anchored the sand, was the moon, thinly open. How would it feel to open myself unashamedly, not covered in darkness? First, to imagine me as a woman capable of risk, and then, to imagine the man worth it. My body was liquid, dreaming it.
Safe Love

Never has anyone loved my skin like the cat who wanted to wash me inch by scoured inch and sleep in my cleaned arms glazed with catspit

and the rust of a gold butterfly she caught.
She reached for me with her tongue when I spoke to her,

she wanted my voice, she wanted to lie under the covers licking my arms.
She came to me mouthing feathers, at either side a birdwing lifted and falling. She ran fast as a rabbit, she tongued blood from her paws.

She wanted to wash me
and sleep in my arms.
I wanted to be loved.
I chewed my nails down raw.
Barton Creek, Alone

When I reached in for an empty bivalve the size of a fingertip, opened, purple-lined,
I wanted to be loved like that,
a hand entering its own reflection.
An old creek, low, the water curled away on the bed in disconnected pools, green-flowered, thickening as the sun sipped, as it warmed the bare moon-white limestone, worn to the shape of holes in the pelvis bone; buzzards rose on the morning thermal, brushstroke wings tracing the column.
The water made no sound alone.
Fish-gulp, rain-spatter.

When the water rose once more, tumbling over the oblique slope-- a pleasant gargling undersound, lip-smacking lap-noises-- I wanted to be filled like a creekbed, more than filled. I saw evidence of old overflow: on the sandbar, young sycamores bent the way of the water, floodnests on their shoulders-- logs, branches, sticks, silt.
Mounds of spongy humus, a half-buried cedar stump with two millipedes on the side, deep magenta, wreathed and connected and holding on somehow together to the vertical.

Mottled stones.
I wanted to be joined like rock and lichen, like liverspots on the hands of old lovers, their wrinkles overlapping like their memories of younger bodies, so intent on each other that the doorway takes them unaware and one falls in.
You Could See It In Missoula

The man walking his fish in the Clark Fork smokes a pipe in baroque puffs, gray moustache curving up in waxed points, catching silver.
No pole, just a loop of line held loose.
His boots are tied on around the middle,
ankle belts, leather flaring like waistlines.
There's an itch he can't scratch--thick pea jacket.
He unties the blue cord that buttons it, pulls out the tail of his faded black "Spawn Till You Die" T-shirt, wriggles his hand up under to his spine.
He calls, "Time to go home"--the filament leash yanks, a gold carp the size of a sub sandwich leaps, slow motion arc and pause like Michael Jordan savoring a slam dunk.
It dives deep. "Now, now," the man says. The fish mouths at the surface, twitching its whiskers.
The man sets down his dented tin pail.
"All right, another minute," he sighs, clouding the words on a pocket mirror, which he rubs to a shine; he touches up one moustache spiral, using a small comb like a close-boned fish skeleton. He coils the line, dips the bucket; the fish swims into it and twists, playful, as the man unfastens the scalloped silver harness with five pearl buttons behind each fin. "Behave yourself," the man says, scratching under its chin. "Don't forget--next time I get to be the fish." I've been imagining how it will feel to outlive someone I love.
Time to stop crying and laugh, superstitious--real sorrow might hurry near.

Outside, the sun
threatens a snowman, slumping his shoulders into the ground, into memory, green and flowering in consolation.

Depending on the light, even the mountains grow larger and smaller, versatile in their unyielding way as the moon.
Some days the sun might as well be the moon, glacial, revising itself with dream persistence, and some days the earth blinds like desire, nothing visible beyond it.

In the windowglare,
my silhouette cutting shadow, all I can see is the light that pales color and colors skin and the dark that fits closer than clothes, trailing behind.

I am going outdoors now, into the light, to squint and grin-- a sympathetic hand for the snow man's brow, his cold sweat dissolving him-- and walk my shadow further on.
Going Through the Motions

Missoula, February, longing for a kiss, I saw in the ladies' room a red mouthprint on the white roll of paper. I thought, She's here, the woman who kissed the mime in Ghirardelli Square.
San Francisco almost blooming, not quite rain, the mime's rainbow trousers flashed.
He made a house with his hands, couldn't get out.
A pale dark-haired woman—like me—strode right through and kissed his cheek;
his hand rose slowly to touch the spot.
I wish she had looked back and not walked so fast. I wish I had kissed him. People cheered and clapped. He bowed, went on building clever walls, but things did not seem so solid for him after that.

I wonder what that woman's up to with her mouth.
She leaves a trail of kisses, so she's never lost.
On marble men in the museum, powdered doughnuts, the white inventory of a pet shop-- lip-graffiti, Zorro of kisses-- there's a crime wave across the continent, nothing's safe: doctor's lapels, a wedding dress, roses in a window vase. Snowmen melt faster.

Once, in Texas, I found snow falling, so lovely I ran back in, to tell someone.
I didn't know then he hated snow.
We weren't in love yet;
we went on that night to the ones who loved to hurt us.
All I knew was I didn't want to go home.
I shivered under the street light, head back, the snow tender on my lips.
The Lovers' Kiss

... Kiss
the mouth
which tells you, here, here is the world.

--Galway Kinnell

For the angle of wrist of the loving curve of hand approaching one's face, we have no translation, only the kiss that follows, the speech implied in touching with one's mouth--

I lapse into pleasure just thinking of it, the lovers' kiss, permission of the central touch;

it presumes all other kisses:
the social kiss, the lips merely an extension of palm, goldfish salute,
and the kiss which is the eating of fruit, lips in a pout on plum, a child's kiss on the cheek, or the child asleep, mouth open on fist,
and the kiss of mineral affection, the uncomplicated element of love at the surface;

for the lovers' kiss answers the impulse of the original kiss, which was in reverse, when the first cell divided, beginning the pleasure of rejoining, which is given only to those who fear parting and suffer loss

if only for the miniscule night of tender sleeping after the kiss of completion, which is always unfinished-- the flesh giving until the lovers rest on their bones, limbs woven, gathered together into sweetness-- even such nights arouse anxiety in lovers, who unfold as they awaken, turning to each other faces full of absent longing, requiring the reunion kiss, lips sensitive as fingertips, parted, tasting, heart in mouth, sweet sour bitter salt,

the return of pleasure.
Beloved

I am my beloved’s, and my beloved is mine.
—The Song of Solomon

I want this word with all its medieval flavor, some ancient syntax associated with God, for we will speak of worship here, not of the self, and not excess, but a thankful simplicity, as we might praise an apple tree for its fruit or shadows for being the base of light, the flowing-outward of self that is itself a language—we speak what once we thought impossible to think, we have made real

what we did not dare to want-- as laughter wells up, chest pumping to draw it forth, or water bubbling from the mouth of the spring, generous perplexity of water, for we will speak of thirst here, of wetting one’s lips

with the thought of water, which is the taste of wet earth made clear, which is the taste of flesh when hot, which sweat made salt,
which is the taste of thirst, which is the flavor of blood, a word with the sound of Beloved.
