Fall 2012

Before the Tribulations

Greg Wrenn

Let us know how access to this document benefits you.

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarworks.umt.edu/cutbank

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://scholarworks.umt.edu/cutbank/vol1/iss77/37

This Poetry is brought to you for free and open access by ScholarWorks at University of Montana. It has been accepted for inclusion in CutBank by an authorized editor of ScholarWorks at University of Montana. For more information, please contact scholarworks@mail.lib.umt.edu.
BEFORE THE TRIBULATIONS

You can't breathe our air,
a tasteless, invisible mix,
so you wear a pressurized suit, a helmet
like a fishbowl

over your head. For once your beard's combed and trimmed;
your greenish-gray eyes
reflect

the sky like wet sand
after a wave recedes.

You've come back for me after two millennia, the Fifth and Sixth Crusades,

a plague that hardly kept me chaste,
so I can escape the hour,

the centuries of trial.
I'm frustrated,
I can't kiss you, I can't bring any books,
my gloomy

gratitude giving me
the shivers. "This world," you mouth, "is just a dream."
I'll never smell a forest again.

Never feel a lemur's nose. What's the use of running from calamity? (So many silently, loudly in pain.)
We gotta go soon,
you say in your muffled telepathy.
I rush to mist my succulents,
murmur babytalk to them.
Lock my dirty cell.
Shake out my welcome mat.

I run to grip your glove—