Hearing is a Talent That Must Be Honed

Brianna Noll
HEARING IS A TALENT THAT MUST BE HONED

We've always been listeners, our ears pricked like dogs' at a high-pitched whistle or the word treat, but we lower our eyes in public to avoid being called eavesdroppers—though we are, of course. We are indiscriminate listeners. Our ears have been trained to filter conflicting sounds—the conversations in a crowded room, the cacophony downtown—and reassemble them logically, contiguously.

In this way, we become, perhaps, multiple—some might say many-eared. To do this, we practice: one will whisper into a windstorm, and the other will discern the language from the squall, translating both. Our next challenge: to understand a foreign language simply by listening hard enough. We imagine this will be difficult,
but eventually meaning
will emerge
like the blurred
figure of a man—
a man slowly broadening into a group of men—
from the haze of desert horizon, suddenly
coming into focus.