Lôôwe led our first parents up through a hole in the ground. They emerged from the earth with seed and baboons, with sheep fattened in green fields, and left their footmarks in molten rock at Ga Lôôwe. On a single leg, Lôôwe returned alone through the hole to Mosima.

— myth of the Sotho-Tswana
The Rendering

Rising off pavement, corrugated steel rusts. The drone of backhoe fills the rendering plant’s maw. The driver calls himself Clot. His shadow crosses four horses, tongues lolling. The air smells of congeal, magpies at vitreous humour. Where do we reside? All lift and thrust from a nest of sticks, the hawk emerges with trout, crescent, thrashing, their shade nosing autopsy-orange. Cells devoid of impulse, bacteria that foment gristle, matter seeking return to water. Return... Cows and horses, all aphony, all bloat, heaped a dozen high till Clot can’t tell who’s bay, whose udder, whose striated muscle suspended by hook falls femur, hind, uterus, gut, falls heart, falls mane...

Flying west the day grows early. The edge of time moves toward Arctic midnight, till somewhere near Midway, time closes over what’s supposed—fly not into yesterday, but imperceptibly into tomorrow when smoke ascends the five-story pagoda, Benten Yama, Basho’s tiled bell fanning the hands that lifted smoke, temple where Kami resides, when into the ocean he set a spear to carve the instant—raku-shitsu. The instant matter is touched, the mind is revealed. Brush or knife, the one horizontal Kozan strokes for years. Records of wind, earth, records of matters. An appaloosa eats a feed bag of oats, alfalfa, till neck-injected, it falls fetlocked. Clot chains a hoof. The Horseman pulls away. Sow who ate nine fine farrows, down the caked chute quickly go. Hide of nag, hoof of bull, mixty mixty, the zeider falls. Sheep, tongue of colt, lip of chicken gibber. Mizzled offal, into the Hogger fall, fur and feather, bloat, marrow, piripiri, caraway, juniper, salt. Fall, fall in alkali, soaked, estered, screwpressed into the druups, hydrolized, oxidized, leathered, soaped and tallowed in the sound of water, ritual filaments woven white, chrome, into the impulse, the instant, susupired from that paper and its boreal sky.
Diaspora: Sound of the Portrait

There were those who herded over hillock and stone.
There were dirt farmers who trudged over bogs.
Tenants who roofed their fowl inside their homes, and those whose black wool found a way down the lane. Who waved away the stillborn tossed into the North Atlantic, and one who slept in the flame of a famous hotel.
The McGuinness of that McGuinness' McGuinness.
The descendant of a whoremonger, yes.
Also of chant and postulancy.
It's the way that toora-looras inevitably make the thatch and clover seem so quaint, so distant.

O century of the washboard and the rubber factory—O holy dark without a star, thank you for this recent peace, to the breathed relief of priests and the mutter of beading women. Thank you for one never betrothed among all those simple sacraments that couldn't hold for life.
For the ointment. The flies, base and debasing, riven with lymph with grease from the laying of eggs.
Are we uncomfortable with Creation?
Shimmers green and black raising mea culpa, Aves, relics of Eugenia's garment, Agatha's breasts, the lips of Felicity and Perpetua. Agnes, the salmon-suited bride. Her sisters, cheeky, her sailor, permanently smiling, waiting in the car. In the car she sleeps, yes, all the way to Niagara, the glacial rapids preceding many dark stories, the rush eroding shale cataract plunging sixteen stories.
In their room, windows seep clerestory light.

A decade later, lying amid their wide bed having split a shin, waiting for her to bathe the blood-stuck bandage. This woman who scrapes old wax from linoleum with a butter knife, might have been a doctor whose hands could flesh out holes. Her sailor, whose tenor bounces around the tiled shower, might have been a Mario Lanza. It may be the way she teaches me to stanch the flow, how with stilts and pogo-sticks, with the boy’s shiny bike she helps me to know— with nickel allowance she helps me to know— with laundry piles unfolded on my bed. It is not merely her fingertips, winter-cracked at the water’s end, from which I know pride.
The Crane Fly

With one limb
fine enough to wing
the head of a pin,
the crane fly steps
on the hope of the dead, and struggles to flee the spider's mesh of instinct and impassive need that I neglected to wipe from my sill.

No hunger is defeated by this delicate fury.
What purpose then,
to snag this breath in winter?
Unhindered by pernicious reason,
the crane fly shudders, and before I release its filamentary tether, folds its wings.
Amid the Cooling

Some days I see the ocean skim the shore leaving foam to shiver, returning again, bringing tumbled glass, whale bone laced in bladder wrack, and the occasional whelk, then lie full across earth’s vast opening before finally acceding to moon’s imperceptible urge and pulling away.

The maw of a full moon tide bites into parking lots.
Avalanches asphalt to the sandy foot of bluff and sucks it away to the grinding races. Earth pushes back with offshore winds that spew horsetails from beach-bound purple swells turning teal as they tumble stones and bivalves, and loosen the hulls of horseshoe crabs.

Light sluices through lodgepole and larch haphazardly grown each beside each at the edge of this wood darker inside than out. Diffused bluing obscures the fern-like foliage of creekside mountain ash. A wind deep in the forest, my own footfalls, the scolding chatter of squirrels as I come too close to loot.

I cannot predict the second my eye no longer shifts above or below horizon.
And though the foghorn sounds every half-minute, the instant split between ebb and flow is evident only in retrospect. I am aware, because tide takes the shore incrementally, that light gives shape to earth.
Georgic

After the harvest of organs, of long bones, we praise this god who gleans his power from pharmacy, electricity, from planting— not green in fertile bottoms, but meat in caverns, blood-rich and sinewed.

When a Lazarus rises from death, rides the river, we praise, for a graft will flower, will fruit. When withered leaves no longer breathe, when frost stops sap, and ice cleaves bark and pulp, who would call the cold wind Executioner?
Dimuendo

Some evening when the whip-poor-will calls out you'll whistle back, and searching sky you'll miss her fleet deception: whip-poor-will, diversionary woodnotes from a distant field.

What-cheer-cheer, the cardinal teaches flying toward you, purty-purty-purty reaching where you stand. A trill from overhead he's caught you deep inside, far from brood and mate whose own dull tone fails to mask assertive tactics.

What then? Not solitude nor withness, not color nor repertoire prevails.
Sleepwalker, Sleepwalker, left behind, spoke of the thousand bleeds to come. Bent to plant the seeds so light, wind blew them.

  Such need from the spore.

I leapt toward middling, body transparent, axis bound between planes, a perfect prism dispersing only the colors she inclined to see. Caraway, caraway, formless and empty anxiety.
  Barley, hops, curling the frigid, scotch wetting the scorch.

Plunging into deep (where pressure bruises) to finger the fissure, hands tangling this weed of hair, waves around salt hips, her legs, her eyes reflecting mother’s porcelain cheeks, my own red lips, shattered, I gave up breath and woke,

daring to speak: How long?
  How long will you blot out?
  Scorn, rebuke, give breath unless on it, too, I should choke. Succor my affliction, live, and you dwell—Daughter, daughter, ice and glase, not of my clan.

  Cast out, I mother my own choosing, choose my own sib.
  Stanched and bled, as Sarai received Sarah, I hear Sophia— in change I bloom hydrangea shout my name: Sophia.
(Mannequin, mannequin, understand krill stranded on sand.
The eelgrass soured in afternoon wrack.
    Dolphin caught in a gill net and drowned.)

Inhaled the perfume, she expired, even as I held her.
First Snow
   "the vast white bird furrows our featherless women with unknown shocks ..."
   — D.H. Lawrence

From our valley, the trumpeter’s flown.
But his ko-hoh still echoes. Through the glass, my wife sees only northern faces muted with white.
Can she see if orange leaves the larch?

My ducks are smoked, the buck butchered, the scraps vinegared, spiced, ground, and stuffed into sheep gut hung in coils so pungent—she forgets to feed our sons.

She neglects to close the door on snow.
When led away, her feet remain, ghosted in drift.
Flakes tuft her shirt, darken to blots like ink.
Can she see the atom quicken time itself?

Come again Trumpter, with neither kiss nor caress.
Come as lightning. I’ll reckon the chaos if fortune resides in ice that summer tilled under, and nothing but pain plows such lines.
"And how can body, laid in that white rush, But feel the strange heart beating where it lies?"
— W. B. Yeats

And October’s smog concealed his tatter, his feet all veined, curled like maple leaves.

By the dim lit water, slowly strolled a girl, unwitting of his lurking, his bold intent.

Or did she, greedy for his hollow bone, his quill feather, lure him with lycra?

Did her fingers fondle down?
Did she release elastic thighs, lift her tattooed breast to the rake of algaed teeth?

Then whose breath flowed through his vanes?
"Then, at last, he felt his plumage and in her lap became truly swan."
— Rainer Maria Rilke

Rushing out to Wall Street the banker's need whelmed over ordinary impulse.
He bought an evening
swan— cashmered, wingtipped— entered his Fleetwood, entered him.
The youth's silk surprised him.
The downy chest confused him, opened his eyes to marquees racing by, the sugared nuts toasting, and brassy taxi horns.
Sodium lighting
the feather-whiskered face faded under the East River bridge. His youth disappeared, and emerged with a girl.
The banker sat in the chauffer's seat.
Silk winding her wrist, her throat. The ripping satin panties.
In the rearview mirror, she met the banker's eye.
Yanked the scarf that stifled her cry.
Along the Deerfield, the Cold, the Hoosic

The Berkshires are dressed in the black-bottomed, white-topped clouds of November that almost conceal a glider. At the first souvenir shop stocked with maple sugar, Minnetonka moccasins, and plastic coonskin caps, we mount a ten-flight climb that plummets to the past through a compassed viewfinder. See where the Boston & Maine used to chug. The wooden Indians sold to antique shops down river. This trail named for victors—the Mohawk—the Pocumtuck before them almost forgotten.

Pavement edging its vistas: lakes that huddled for generations on ridges, now obscured by growth of locust, birch. Among the tatters, trading posts and shells of motor inns that litter its course, wild aster claims satellite dishes. Dorito bags crisscross contrails, ghosts of civilization floating the improbable sky.

We seek an eastern face to tuck into. Wrapped back in the last light filtered through pines, we stop instead at Whitcomb Summit Hotel. It reeks of yellow onion that clings to clothes for nineteen miles down the western face, past shuttered Wigwam Cottages, hairpin turn, past millbuildings where rocks thrown by generations broke not only the glass. Rising from unlevel beds, we ask the desk clerk where to get a scotch. She points under the bridge. A Maine Central engine rusts on a hundred feet of track, and shopkeepers sell bayberry candles from abandoned textile mills. Outside, company housing remains company housing. A wind rising from Atlantic sands scales the wall covered by frost. Drawn by the cheee of hawks, rise from sea level, from scrub oak and poverty grass, worn by swarms that tramped, rise like cranberries released to float.
on bogwater, past the weathered hips of salt spray roses, tumbled barns.
With a flock of geese retreat, as jets camouflaged green skim the pinetops, as vapor streams between the tips of wings.
Receiving

This grey hair can still feel your father’s fingers from forehead to nape.
True wealth is rising late at night to write the silence.
True wealth is rising late the next day.
“Asshole!” is a satisfying epithet when someone makes you stand on your brakes.
It’s ok to call your basketball buddies “my boys.”
It may be ok to call Gambian women “my women” if they’re your team.
I drove a woman I didn’t know to Stockbridge, up her mountain to the house she’d abandoned when the tumor advanced. I vacuumed turds & mattress stuffing, wheatgrass ornaments chewed & strewn toward floorboard nests. She urged me to finish before her wife (26 years) arrived. She repaid the favor, asking me to stay while she died.
How The Thing That Happens, Happens

Two bullets desired a shotgun wedding, so they entered & slept with the bride & groom, then ricocheted into the pulpit to sleep with the preacher.

Since I had charge of public policy—I was John Q.—I said, if you're so tired then enter a hibernator, but do not snooze in an incubator. I said, you may sleep with a curly horn sheep, but do not enter a statistic.

Statistics, I said, go to bed while bullets sleep with buffalo to prevent brucellosis.

Meanwhile, in the House, someone uncounted, with a musket, began to seduce the hearing. You'll start a blunderbuss, you do that, I said, you'll find you'll have to muzzle it.

The bullets were sleeping with the bluehairs. I said, old men, no, & not infants in cribs.

I said to the bullets that they should have lunch in the statistics' cafe. But the bullets wanted to sleep with the cook. You are too sleepy, bullets, I said. But by that time the bullets' whole family had moved in, & were sleeping in the gym—Hey, that's where kids play basketball.

But bullets don't hear when they're not awake. So I called the public out of the pubs & said to them that this is a peace of attrition, that they must bed the bullets, or bullets would bed them.
The Business Suit
for Lynn Emanuel

Of what stripe is this habit on a hanger, this modern mail hanging in the tailor’s window? We wish to wear it, it wishes to be worn, it wears like a wish—trim with interlock, it’s a fraternity of pinstripes, straight, homogenous, legion, finished with topstitch, a skyscraper on whose blueprints we’d love to smudge our fingers.

It’s an elevator enclosing the girded portfolios of a certain body of men—the placket overlapping is a nighthawk’s breast, the feathers’ waxy surface, small protection—when they’re in it, they’re camouflaged, another nova among a sea of stars.

Right now it’s a beacon locked behind plate glass; while we’re busy washing off the ink, it glows there the dim flame of itself in a sky of dusk, a sky of dawning, neither burning out, nor burning up.

Coney Island

Beckon to ships fifty miles out to see this Eden of electricity, the wheel, the alchemy, the spiral light from minarets. See the excess: Bulbs pulsing the impermissible among the bustle, mermaids parading bare-bellied. Skinny swimming beneath a wave of arc lamps, the faces masked hilarious in Blowhole Theater’s bright reflection. Horses steeplechasing past the lath, the plaster of Pompeii toward Dreamland. This Brighton sand may be Elysium to tumblers, contortionists, to the impresarios of chaos controlled. But these arcades are home to Babe, the Fulcrum of the Avoirdupois, and Lionel, the Dog-faced Boy. To midgets living in half-scale, this is Lilliputia. To Dr. Couney’s preemies, these crystal incubators are life supported with quarters paid by the curious. Intuit sacrifice in tenements asbestosed & twice daily engulfed in flame. The ringmaster’s lash, the simultaneity of all your fears. In delirium’s dark cave, silent but for the organ, sterile except the projectionist’s cigar. Chaplin’s antics go ash. Imagine, if you will, sweat coursing down your breast. Then listen to the echo.
Autumn, Graves in Foss Woods

Thought, a chickadee lighting talon & solar plexus to slip thistle off a finger, to leave hollow shells spent & the echo of a feather fallen over the kettle pond over the stones unnamed, numbered for the pox upon their kin lain in earth & also forgotten.
Ice Mask

At the confluence, a heron watches the rivers freeze. Snow falling into water catches the edge, the ice moving downstream till a community of floes extends, reaching currents in oceans north of fjords. Berge blossom before the submarine plunges, prow-first to rest on a bed, quiet. This far from the Gulf Stream, did a whale sing to what must have seemed a cousin?
Or was the sailors’ only sound the pulse of radar? Only the living know the body’s need to leave a last impression. Know how breath conceives with avalanche the perfect expression: a fragile unthere.
The Burren

Beneath the clint, limestone scraped
  bared by glacier,
beneath the mineral sea,
  rolls a drone Atlantic.
  In half-tones,
pastels,
  clouds mitigate the monochromatic.
whisper leaking
  from this creviced scape, from grykes,
shallow holes
  sprouting Milkwort, Lady’s Bedstraw.
Lesser Dodder.
  It may be the river deceives:
A turlough welling by noon, is drained by dawn,
gone past Ailwee Cave,
  where earth-fealty
  echoes
through gallery graves.
  Where hazel and yew
  once thrived,
a queue of wedge tombs
  and henges perch, unyielding, rooks croak and wait to reconcile.
  Cairns scattered across the plateau.
An ogham stone marks this passing with eroding strokes,
dusting the caul,
  transparent and taut round two perfect lambs lying inside
the beak-clean bones of their dam.
Poem for Claudia Rodriguez

Here, rooted by jicama, by lime, children sell Chiclets from doorways.

February's wind dries the arroyo, dusts alfalfa fields that men defend with bullwhips.

Take wing, seek asylum in the epicenter of bells where Madonnas dirge, mantilla-draped, behind a hearse.

One holds a doll like a monstrance.
Hear the shudder—the jail in Texcoco, iron dwarfing the cell. Something seeping through walls, through floor, slickens the stone. Outside, tourists toss coins to the toothless, light wax under tissue ballooning to drift red, eclipsing the stars over barrios, Teotihuacan, over Los Piños where women cuff hands to the palace gate, weight their tongues, their teeth with chain. Her skirt sliced to the waist, who would not have aimed, have shot some vital part of his body? How soft the skin of mangoes.

Lake of the Second Death

There is no rain west-northwest, but light near Sleeping Child, near the Garden Wall, and then it is memory: the coulee's rustle: a river's murmur slurried with ash. There is no rain, only the road, its dust oiled, graded. Thunder's breath ripples on rock, on rhythms edging the rim of reservation. There is no rain. Only the drone, larch, lodgepole and char. There is the drone, the chant, the footfalls, the skins' thrum rippling air, spiralling up the lodgepoles. From silhouettes, the breaths' humidity rises to coalesce with smoke, with vapor to damp February, the rarest wind from summer's direction licks the frame houses, hip-roofed, shoulder to shoulder through two-hundred seasons of sun's blistering, of rogues kicking shoreward, salt cycloned off the harbor, of sand blasting off dunes from north-northeast, light ungodly silhouettes men, standing hoses in hand, standing, there is water, and tongues lifting prayer, spinning air, and there are tongues leaping to wind lapping toward dune, there is a body of water, an ocean, a body of Christ across the street standing deep on lawn.
What to Make of the Thing

"... nothing in versification is ever superseded, surpassed, for prosodies are preserved, or resurrected... if they have any foothold whatever in the language."
—Donald Wesling

Hear the voice! Awaken souls and lyres!
Whose lips will triumph with tongue, rejoice!

In John's beginning, the word was.
The angel, a whisper begetting... two beats and a pause that thane bestowed upon the son of Beow.

Till Arcady's swains did pull unsubtle bows, unquiver sylvan syllables in verdant groves, upon his word, the hero drew his blade to heel the cad who breached, unbreeched, his maid.

But all hips, all haws, haloes have waned. Nard, cedar no longer suffice, nor nymph, cress, nor frogspawn.

Whose urge and urge and urge to create, to iterate praise, estirs the hiding heart, stirs the bird drifting, lifting wing in ecstasy, and ah! the kestrel kiting toward Christ and—Who sings of self untamed, untranslatable, in tropes that tantalize the I, sings of barbaric yawps of ninth-month midnight, of delicate deaths—Both sing from under the sole of your boot.

The gyre's widened. Stilled the falcon's cry. What's preserved is beat and breath beyond the urge to howl—the urge to surpass those angelheaded hipsters burning for the ancient heavenly connection.

Thousands slanting,
supersede elegy—Alexie sings back
magenta, crimson, Chimacum Creek.
Doty's chanteuse speaks the dare
name his Wally.

The crone resurrects
her footheld cradle, rocking—Glock-cocking-
young-creepers with beepers, who sing they gonna bleep her.

Bóne bábes góne féral slóuched inside bóne fáthers.
Heron, Bittern, Shrike

“God has not died for the white heron.”
—W. B. Yeats

Within hours of leaving the river, caddis flies clutter the asphalt.
Driver #1 proceeds westerly, the eyewitness says, lost to toads lying geothermal, in sulphered mud along the Lochsa’s oxbow.
A gold coupe, spewing & rusted.
This surface ripples as heron dagger trout, rise through shrouds of steaming air to utter crawl. How long until, infested by beetle, the lodgepole’s lichen half gives way, splits, cracks like gun bursts from a duckblind?
Driver #2 follows, a pick-up alongside at seventy, eighty, muffler loud as a rip-saw.
A bittern lifts its foot, slender—the wind—settles on reedbed stubble, pointing skyward aligning stripes with stalks, winter-hollowed.
Last year’s cattails burst, their velvet frayed, bittern swaying, unseen.
Off the ramp, the sin of metal on metal unseen by shrike, once silent, still on leafless aspen, arrives the coupe, back-ended. #1 by the shirt, what animal would not gnaw, #2 by the throat, ligament and bone to free itself, Got a piece, shrike down to duff, snatching gun, impaling shrew on hawthorn, wheels & shots & hedging the river, one, two, three, hedging tomorrow, o he temples himself.
Selene,

the thing I came for: the wreck and not the story.

the thing itself
and not the myth, child of the sky diminishing east, infiltrate this valley where inversion clogs the lung, and illuminate this wreck, its stern, its larboard. Dim the sapphire, the trilobite loosed from rimrock. Refract instead off the memory of a surface lapping, refract off rhythmite, off the relics of wounds some man glassed in a keloid cabinet:

the fly that hooked his wife’s cheek.
Shine on Leda’s blanch ellipsis surrounding those sons of an abominate god, on the emptiness between Philomel’s teeth.

There is no ladder here.
Only the space between ribs, the faces blue-white, half-hidden from themselves.

Selene, child of the sky archipelago, your crust is silica, aluminum, calcium as my bone.

Let us go on again.
The Ancestors

stand beside me some mornings in the mirror their fingers outlining my mouth.

My great-great-grandfather often begins, or a Levitical priest cautioning men:

Do not lie with a man as one lies with a woman.
Are we invisible when lying together?

My aunt’s voice dribbles over the tap. She is one whose song I learned young: Amber canted from crystal can slake the smoulder. Once she sang the Angelus in her father’s house.

Of all the sisters, she alone, unmarried, could not stop singing even after he died.

In a whisper flicking across her tongue, she warns me—

Man is the Savior incarnate. Only a man can save you.
I want to say, our house is the first place I have ever felt passion. Though in our house, they find me and say of all the daughters I am the one true disappointment, the girl who holds up mirrors to sacrament, to virgins on altars bound by knot and thread, bound by lace to mortals whose only sin was desire.

Get a man, they say. This is my penance for choosing you. Come with us, they say. To Sligo, where mothers beaded their prayer on flax broken and woven into linen.

Their girls, tatting cuffs and collars, accepted the father's choice, accepted the green earth made black with each spade turned, with each caul buried.

I never lived in that country.

Never stayed in the schoolyard of women refusing to love, refusing to admit this love forsaking their sons.

Crossing themselves, they echo their epithet to sky:
What of the children you refuse to let inside you?

I want to tell you that some nights when your breast is heavy on my palm, I feel beside me the teacher in the mirror whose desire hardened into flesh next to her heart.

I am praying your name, an annunciation sweet as nebulae. When I call, you come to me.
Mudlarking

Near lodgepole locked in late autumn freeze, past steppe that tumesced Missouri’s headwaters, one distant mountain erodes its alluvial skirts.
A couple of coyotes conjure a goose from the wraith-like rookery across the shoal.
With an eye toward tracks and scat we scunge the edge of words for hummocks risen from glacial kettles skimmed in ice.
When sun emerges from hanging valley fog to thaw the browse and loose the stink of decaying aquatic life, my boot’s sucked in, Michael! In Provincetown we embraced while picking cranberries in Wampanoag bogs, so why now stay the urge to reach for her?
Whose reserve is this; whose reservoir so receded to expose shallows freeze-shocked and refusing to yield?
She drops a muskrat skull to grab my hands, moraine, till, hoarfrost, Kootenai.
Aubade

Helianthus
turns its face
to the rising,

hawk, an early toucan, gliding
on thermals,

the blanket
pushed aside,
and inside,

your willowed eyes,
the long steep of tea, Flathead cherries

in morning glories
this spiritoso life we're blind

into afternoon
so bleached and hazed that finches

hide in conifer leaving yellow
to twist west, away.
Itinerant

Sand sweeps from backshore to front growing the reach of this involute cape an inch a year.
While brine stings the eyes, at the edge of wharf fishermen toss a boatload of blues. She retreats inland as gravity descends. Such is the paradox: as the curved rim of ear leads out to lobe, it leads in to tympanum, and deeper yet the synapse, so the verge of earth that unfurls this finger of sand sixty miles out to sea, must back to mainland curl into geography. Unmoored, the twin anchors of foghorn’s d-flat, the indigenous roses, their tendrils clinging to greying cedar shakes. She scrapes the impasto through several states, scratching layers for birth among Berkshire spruce. The Detroit of before, on every four corners, had a gas war.
Before the nurse cauterized a youth shot in one eye; before a monorail began to circle high above empty blocks of grass outlined by concrete, as if once we had rocked those streets. What can be done? In heavy waters of the almost ocean she swims against east, the great glacial lake washing intransigent salts from her head, from her sight, till she sees corn cribbed to continent’s center, fields of sunflower, wheat, and dry pea wrinkled by thermals. Bluffs erupt into brittle ridges rising above hay yellow as the middle line leading past placenames—Bozeman Trail, just east of the great Divide, the rivers flowing pacific or toward the trickle bluegill—there are no creekbeds, cottonwoods, no bleached bones, only horizon linted in half-light, an umber rising warm from a power plant’s flue.
The indeterminate silence two thousand miles into near-dawn, this could be the Atlantic: the ground, unbroken swells rippling to feet;
the stack, a solitary vertical pulsing from a rocky shore; the trailers, a fleet of trawlers flung to earth’s curve in search of the last cod, in search of placenames changed from Atlantic -ports and -mouths, toward midlands where -waters are Broad, Sweet, and Still.
Of Missoula, MT. Formerly of Provincetown, MA, Middletown, CT, Rochester, MI, and Haverhill, MA. On or about March 15. Of removal and deletion caused by the protracted silence of critics. The beloved *.txt file manuscript comprising Alison Pettit of Hudson, NH; Claudia Rodriguez of San Miguel de Allende, Guanajuato, Mexico. The loving, but unlauded, Master Document containing The Burren of County Mayo, Ireland; and The Camas Prairie of Cottonwood, ID. Survived by a dozen subdocuments, 31 unaffiliated verse paragraphs, uncountable fragments on 298,382 bytes of hard disk, and one manilla folder stuffed with pro forma rejection. Itinerant, a deep appreciation of nature, diction that touched its landscapes, reverence for emotion revealed in them. There will be no celebration of its keyboarding, its erasure, and interment will take place in its beloved’s psyche, in lieu of silence, that Itinerant might repose, as in life.
Right Ascension

I have received direction in forks that gird this trackless nowhere. The clack of cedar dangling, frozen green. Frost transforms the branch into something that longs for detachment.

Why journey here?

Why this cloister caught between hip-like hills and coulees? Stone that absorbs the day’s dull light absorbs the psalms. A rise of stairs toward nuns who may be within me, speaking of sacrifice.

Who might speak to me now?
The Jesus of geography. Spirit in chemistry. Every colony, every president, every war—always the isosceles God. Why not this perfect view rolling to expose the slightly brighter plane of prairie?

Saturday night, six priests check into a guesthouse. They change into chaps and harnesses, walk downtown and spend the night as gay as boys they meet at The Vault.
Rising on Sunday, they change again into stoles and chasubles to eat the body of Christ.

Who will accuse them of apostasy?

Are you He because they never cried behind a door?
Are you He because they watched a daughter rest a palm on her mother’s hair, and give her peace?
Ascend this Way of the Cross with me, hill riven with footprints. Make it visible: statues, molded of horsehair and plaster, locked behind apsidal glass.

Jesus Meets His Mother near the grotto—someone’s attempt to recreate Lourdes:
around a Mary, unalabastered, baskets of lily and mock orange.
I create a bouquet of boughs and cones, lay it on a bench hewn from this grove, and face away. Three horses ran, a dream, all mane all tail across the headlight’s arc. Three more closer to the ruin: lattice burnt with chalice, tabernacle, and drape twilled by hands: lifted grate, lifted coals to ignite their Beltaine fire upon a hill.
Those hands that kneaded oaten bannocks, stippled stone, chisled images of women.
Even the galaxy seemed a milky spine.

Are you near? I cannot perceive you.
Plaster and paint overcome you.
Look on me and answer, undim my eyes, forgive me for I have dwelt in near occasions, have taken into myself—Mea culpa, mea maxima culpa—your shadow cast on prairie: the fog drifting north over snowfields questions the very boundary of earth:
you have no voice: you persist in dawn.
Scablands

1.
We'll be flying at 3,000 feet above the stunning fluvial topography resulting from the planet's remarkable process 15,000 years ago, that Satan defied by ignoring the man and dealing with the woman.
When the natural order is so repudiated, it brings ruin, spilling over the northern rim of plateau, eroding a plexus of flood channels.
The governor's her boss, and he loves his horses, a spirit of submission, a disposition to yield, to surrender her will to divine calling. Since he lost his missus, she's his gal on Derby Day.
She loves her girlfriend, it's just the game.
TWO NUBILES PLAY IN BED.
We'll see erosional potholes and giant ripples. Eve's peculiar gullibility drawn into a pattern of relationship destructive to the sanctity of marriage to this very day exploding with the force of Niagaras and leaving a four-mile wide rim at Dry Falls where 400 feet down, their plunge pools. SHAVED GIRLS EXPLORE EACH OTHER'S BODY. When the baby was born with Down's, they hired a sixteen-year-old sitter, a move from biblical feminism endorsing certain expressions of sexuality, who moved in with the wife at twenty-one leading inevitably to the overthrow of normative force gouging the Grand Coulee. They raised all six kids and never said anything about mountains of gravel 50 stories tall, eleven grandchildren, ripple marks 50 feet high. I left the convent for her FROTAGE PHOTOS, UNCENSORED always slept in separate rooms, never told anyone—we were teachers, we were afraid of wounds only partially healed in the soil's epidermis. They wouldn't let me see her, when she was dying.

Formless snow compacted, thawing and freezing, firm moving outward, all directions, born of woman, a pliable continent of ice its granular bed carving cirque from rock that plucks away the headwall, tissue crushed by man kinetic in his urge to plant you.
What lies under this weight?
Loose accumulations of darkening till, lenticular clouds—You learn whom you may touch,
whose voice to hear, wind and needle ice.

Suppose that wind blows silt and sand and snow falls for a year. Would we bloat some vestigial organ to store our grief?
If it burst, what would we loose?
River dammed by glacier filling the valleys in every direction . . .

There's a crack in every creation.
Alpine glaciers battered the faces on opposing flanks of the mountain, cutting a ridge between twin valleys now U-shaped. Eroded this arête, this jagged fish bone splits precipitation either Arctic or Pacific.
Pulled downhill by gravity, the modern glacier abrades bedrock, grinds it to flour that seeps through tunnels through turbid waters underlying, flushing to streams turned turquoise. When ice within flows at different speeds, stress causes the ice to fissure and separate.
Your feet lose their grip, you slide down through a crack, down through a tunnel puckered and edgy.
Your shout so close to the wall where you land, blue as light leaking through it.
The others are here with rimed noses, or toes pierced, needles freeze the veins.
You choose to lie anesthetized by amber, recognize the men stiffened over other men, You recognize the fear.

Imagine cliffs and sheets of ice a mile thick. Ritualize: satin and seed pearl, stopping a lowland flow (. . . lace and cumberbund) — imagine an inland sea so deep, boutonierre, pegnoir, trousseau, what once were mountains mere islands, African crystal and rare heavy metal, combining Ontario and Erie—women straining to hold back — Niagara Falls, Tahiti, the Taj Mahal, Bali, five hundred cubic miles of water, tureen, chargers, a starter castle, Lake Missoula, sex, a colossal liquid knife prying the base of glacier as a woman lifts you, heaves you out of the blue, rubs your cheeks, your arms to rouse (stumbling deep into the tunnel). Breathes warmth into your mouth (thaw, thaw) leading you toward what light is left. She pushes you higher, chafes your wrists, her hands pressed into your breast, breath, hair, hands her hands (a susurrus swelling), and for days and nights diluvian, ten times the water of all the world’s rivers rocketed boulders and ice across the western plain, pushed thunder and dust ahead of it. Creatures running along the earth without a single cubit of protection were deluged by stripping loess, by collonades of basalt loosened and blasted through passes, impounding a river and reversing its flow. Vortices deep enough to hide an iceberg, gorging holes, roared toward mountains that enclosed a gap.
And it pushed back. The flood slowed to half-speed— isolating cobble up hundreds of feet where millions of rodents gathered— before ramming debris a thousand miles into the sea, into which obsidian and lodestone tumble like diamonds.
