2005

Parallel to shore

Alexandra Tinari

The University of Montana

Let us know how access to this document benefits you.

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarworks.umt.edu/etd

Recommended Citation

Tinari, Alexandra, "Parallel to shore" (2005). Graduate Student Theses, Dissertations, & Professional Papers. 3174.
https://scholarworks.umt.edu/etd/3174

This Thesis is brought to you for free and open access by the Graduate School at ScholarWorks at University of Montana. It has been accepted for inclusion in Graduate Student Theses, Dissertations, & Professional Papers by an authorized administrator of ScholarWorks at University of Montana. For more information, please contact scholarworks@mso.umt.edu.
The University of Montana

Permission is granted by the author to reproduce this material in its entirety, provided that this material is used for scholarly purposes and is properly cited in published works and reports.

Please check "Yes" or "No" and provide signature

Yes, I grant permission
No, I do not grant permission

Author's Signature:

Date: 12-10-05

Any copying for commercial purposes or financial gain may be undertaken only with the author's explicit consent.

8/98
PARALLEL TO SHORE

by
Alexandra Tinari
B.A. The New School for Social Research, New York City, 1999 presented in partial fulfillment of the requirements for the degree of Master of Fine Arts

The University of Montana
December 2005

Approved by:
Chairperson
Dean, Graduate School
12-21-05
Date
PARALLEL TO SHORE
Contents

Work • 1

In a Hush • 2

Sheep in a Strange Field • 3

Except the Wings, Flapping • 4

Before Mirrors • 5

The Letter • 6

Moving • 7

In the Karilian Forest • 8

Water • 9

Ship • 10

The Hanging Poems • 11

Ghazal for Dying • 15

St. Judas Hospital • 16

Museum • 17

Petrified • 18

Whose Voice is Heard • 19

Petrified • 20

Ars Poetica • 21

Red-Winged Blackbird • 22

Generosity • 23

National Book Award Winner, 1962 • 24
Summer • 25
Ritual Before Marriage • 26
Atlas of August • 27
Slow • 28
Feel the Print • 29
Slipping a Little • 30
Flora’s Eve • 31
Some Princesses • 32
Arrows • 33
Notes • 34
When you transsume your own material, it has more pungency because it derives from what is your own. Such transsumption of language is like a mirror for you, since you see yourself in it and recognize your own sheep in a strange field.

Geoffrey of Vinsauf, Poetria Nova

When death comes, we take off our clothes and gather everything we left behind: what is dark, broken, touched with shame.

Linda Gregg, The Sacraments of Desire
It should be snowing
by now

but isn’t.
Floes rub

beneath the bridge.
It is dusk.

Fish lie adrift
where water

still flows.
The truss rocks

its still spiders.
This is the point of the iceberg. The colliery glows.

I will call it
IN A HUSH

Birds have no genitalia, just two oval orifices rimmed with mucus, held by desire's seal in midair. I want to be that small bird ensconced within a bush trembling with song. Or, more commonly, tugging at the hard earth to bring forth seed. Those I love are not remembered for the ways I loved them. Nor are they forgotten for the ways in which I failed. A bird would have flown toward the wiry black thread that held my aunt's lips shut in death and tugged until the string became something useful. My aunt said a bird would sing to her every morning, in the rain, in the sun. It seemed impossibly true, her loving something she had not yet found.
We yearned to be loved by our fathers, but our fathers were rising up. Though we tried to wish rising into the opposite of falling, our wishing stalled. We had not nailed even two pieces of wood, we had never picked ourselves up, not even once, without finding sheep in a strange field, without vegetable life dissolving amphibious or pulverized. When our fathers left us in unfamiliar places without a look, touch, or salute, we remained more reptile than bird. Rock hammered the first nail. No rope; rope drags. So we starved.
EXCEPT THE WINGS, FLAPPING

The days were dark. Crows cried, landed heavily on pines. If granted a wish, she would have wished for doves and monks in crimson robes. Not this dog barking at the wind. Yet the world was still. Only she moved and was moved. Secretly she touched herself among the rye. Night melted. Then morning broke. Everything hardened. Darkness entered when she woke. Dreams had been stained with many-colored lights. At dawn they froze beneath the day.
BEFORE MIRRORS

We longed to be dear
 to our mothers,
 but our mothers
 were cloistered in static,
 wed to enameled
 interiors channeled by breakers.
 Gulls tore pink moons
 from crimped casings.
 Though we seized
 them, we did not know
 the proper way to stake
 our claims. Periodically
 we caressed them,
 tracking their grooves.
 Shellacked,
 on glass shelves, before
 mirrors, we glimpsed their uneasy
 reflections, hollowed
 by a weightlessness
 touch might subsume.
I am not feeling whole yet, but I am tending to my body. The weather is relentless. I read and write all day then drive to the lake. Walk deliberately to the water and enter. I do not know what I hope to gain. I feel I am doing what I know how. It reminds me of when I was seventeen, dreaming of women, two willows bowing, stars appearing. Perhaps poetry asks me something that others do not. Perhaps I am waiting to be asked. My clichés I love as children. I cook, clean, wash, sleep. Sometimes I go into town in the morning and read a whole book over coffee. Sometimes I stand in front of the lake, glistening.
MOVING

In the kitchen
cabinet's
dusty corner
I discover
a nest:
sock lint, dried grass,
scrap of red yarn,
cereal box labels
in curled strips,
tightly woven
by her long golden hair.

It trembles in my palm, light
with slight impressions of bodies.
Collecting
her things,
she must take it
but won't.

I've traveled
to a far
field:

dented pillow
clawed scalp uvula grapes

stunned creature
hunkered
to the trap's back.
Try to shake it out.
IN THE KARILIAN FOREST

More. Sergei watches his great-grandfather whittle white wood. Shavings curl and crest like waves. Under wood wasps, woodpeckers, the pile grows. He wants to dive into them. Tumble, not climb inside, just be swallowed. Without waiting Sergei grasps the knife, makes wood whisper. Other fallen things: wet straw, acorn wombs.

In Between. Because this is the way it is done, we pass it through fire. Because this is the way it is done, we pass it through fire. This is the way it is done.

In His Native Language. Wolves. Beyond his window, Cassiopeia, wing.

Careless Water.
Woman. Welter.

Winnowed beaver wood. Chisel, whorl-rubbed ash. Sergei watches his great-grandfather’s wrist. The object inhales. Through fire, the object wakes.

Sound: wet willow wishes.
WATER

carving shallow scars no one sees i keep my toe underwater until it's red, my foot so blue-yellow it's hers in the ICU—neck : legs : fingers seize we bury earth's earth fissure unbridgeable places consider pocketing faded egg-blue river stones

asphyxiate that's the color her eyes
The ship grew larger, steel sparkling, as it traveled parallel to shore. We stood on the warm sand, watched the massive black hull enter the familiar blue space, our private horizon. Repeatedly I waved until my mother said, "They’ve seen you, but you can’t see them back." Her dead brother behind one of the portals, calmly observing the scrolling shoreline. I knew it wasn’t true. He couldn’t see me in my new tri-colored swimsuit, its smiling whale with orange button eye I twisted on its thread. With ESP I called (come outside) where I could chart his sunken figure, red swimming trunks, the end of his cigarette beginning to flare.
I.

You'll return when she finally folds the limp sweater into her basket. Your sister guides needles through wool. They chatter like electric teeth. She tells stories about little you: small boat, wind at fifty knots, killdeer's stuttering defense, spring when orange golf balls unearthed themselves. Your mother reads aloud about men spearing seals or harpooning whales.

What was that?

Maybe a tree branch thrown to the roof, hungry raven's caw. I eye the bowl of clementines, taut pocked skin against gentian china. As she reached for one, your sister's opal necklace, its aerial weight.
II.

Did I say gentian? No, I meant the miniature blue windmills and weeping willows. The kitchen's oak table, its thickness. Your sister's fingers chattering, yes, your mother's silence after the wind died down. Her head tilted like a bird's, mouth cracked. Your collection of spotted salamanders, flattened by cars and dried in the sun, weeks spent piecing together the boxer turtle's shell, face green under the den's fluorescent light. Crystalline winters: stove choked with mossy wood, father's cigar smoke fogging the porch. Moan of lake ice and spring river's rush. Woods we hauled blackberries out of. Picnics, rolling hills: rolling hills. We blew the insides out of eggs from your father's chickens, painted them, hung them in the Japanese maples before dawn. Before dawn, with sewing shears, your father snipped the fishing wire and watched each shell slip to the open earth.

III.

Winter we sang Handel’s Messiah in the snug white church on the hill. Winter you hung yourself with boat rope in the crowded attic, bird droppings splattered the floorboards, your plumb-lined body part of some experiment, something we might have done together.

Hauling you down,
you not you, pounding hard on your chest : hands : mouth : compressions : breath slight involuntary intake, faintly started heart. Not the dream in which you loose your kite above Benedict Pond, string taut until it drags you up, into IV.

Stasis: not static, not a flicker under the dried out lids they bathe in saline daily, small puffs, clicks, and cheeps of the machines, skin’s brittle sloughing, brambled hair overtaking
the starched sheets, your mother cutting it

she’s cutting

The metal furnace is fired up and it’s spring, the switches are flipped, it’s utterly cold and soundless
GHAZAL FOR DYING

Thick photographs from attic albums.
   Calla lilies. What we the living mine.

A space dug into. Your clenched fists held to your chest like a sign

Toward the ones who betray you.
   You are deaf to our choosing the pine.

Still in a room, the stillness out loud.
   The body will not be kind.

Now it's a room. Soon, just room.
   Noon-day bells will chime.

There will be a casket, silk-lined
   the craftsmen lacquer to shine.

They will make you hold a cross.
   I've seen it done. Not for you, you're fine.

You're dying. The bees are singing.
   Come get your bread and your wine.

We will crowd around you. Shroud you.
   Come quickly, come swiftly. It's time.
ST. JUDAS HOSPITAL

Gloves, gas, scalpel, scope, laser, knife.
She forgot to survey her life

like they warned she would do, instead tried to name the exact glue they'd turned her mouth, limbs, her torment

to: was it crazy, Elmer's, rubber cement?

It bothered her she could not think of it. It was then the room sunk into darkness, she heard voices murmuring. A bird

loose, she thought, they should let it out. And then pain bit

into her mind, body blued,
she couldn't recall what she knew,

Floor moving, into recovery,
what crime

had she committed? And why hadn't she cried before, that time at the pageant

when she'd forgotten her lines,
Hark I bring thee good tidings

yet stood her ground, stubborn, impatient for the babe to be born.
We get instead
a man on the bench
clutching his dick
like he can't find a place to put his piss. Looking up we catch the exact moment rain begins. We feel a little better. Inside,
circumcised irises
clatter the picture
window, clouds form
into chandeliers. Rain
now in gessoed strokes.
So dark we squint
to see into it. One called “Oranges”
is a cat with its eyes
gauged out.
PETRIFIED

Place. Man climbs in.
To a faraway
It is my way of moving
Almost my voice. He is not a man.
His piece of flesh
Around my neck. He's secured
On my ankles, rope
He is wood.
The ironing board
His shirts across Tight as
I pull the sheets
Some nights
On my thighs. He's rolling his die
Forces cold utensils
He
The winter sky. I become god
The moon in
I keep still as
WHOSE VOICE IS HEARD (Ho Nah’unpi Win)

It was the winter I stopped drinking.
The winter I shaved my head, removed all my rings because they said it would get so hot in there I would kiss
the ground, though it seemed ridiculous
in February on the South Dakota plains.
When we climbed Harney Peak
the weather changed four times. I heard singing, drums, and the medicine man
leaned close whispering
It’s the wind through the trees. He didn’t say those are our ancestors buried beneath this mountain. The winter the ghost sat at the table Miss, the youngest,
pointed to the empty chair, saying It’s uncle.
He’s hungry. It was the winter I fed the uncle. And I fed the children. Fed myself bricks of fry bread soaked in commodity butter. The winter
I found my voice low and sure between each word between each way of saying. That winter I learned to love the cold, though three people died two miles from here, gauze
of frost around their open mouths.
A half-dead
man climbs in my bed
steals my warmth
with his cold, wet tongue. He is not a man. He is arctic blue. He is wood on my ankles, rope around my neck. Some nights
I pull the sheets tight
as my father’s shirts across the ironing board. Still he forces in. Places cold utensils on my thighs. I keep still as
the moon in
the winter sky.
ARS POETICA

a blue more blue than azure then a cawing
winding shadows across the land
an icy surface where ravens reflect but coiled words
can catch in your throat
like mirrors
Beneath the sky’s slow wake of retreating waves, we drive. A red-winged blackbird alights on every milepost. In September I was choked and raped atop a chapel’s black piano. The strings vibrated when my head struck the keys. As I left my body, I remembered a pamphlet I once found between some books in the public library. In crucifixion, it said, tongue becomes sand, lungs grind flesh upon flesh, glands sweat blood. Once sorrow has found its body.

We pass a cottonwood near a creek, a leaning barn, haybales. Three mares rear their heads, another gallops close, ribs showing. Blackbirds anchor the bales, pluck straw and lift away.
GENEROSITY: A STORY

One evening as a Western Meadowlark sang from the tip of a tall Norway Spruce, a woman selling magazines approached my house. Unremarkable in every other way, the woman wore a large brown patch over her left eye. After a perfunctory smile and nod she asked: Do I enjoy sports? Am I interested in improving my health? Do I want to keep up with the latest fashions? Her professionally inquisitive voice caused me to feel immersed in a tub of cooling Jell-o, its warm sweet smell enveloped me, until she paused and I was returned to the porch steps in my bathrobe.

“What happened?” I asked. She said her brother shot it out with his bb gun. She wears a patch out of common courtesy and (she admitted) to spare herself embarrassment. “Does it cause you any pain?” In fact, almost constant pain keeps her from regular employment; thus her appearance at my doorstep with subscription forms. I declined the magazines and went inside.

The woman returned the following week. This time, instead of selling Good Housekeeping or Simple Living, she described a procedure that offered the possibility of a new eye. Unlike glass, this prosthesis would be made from living tissue, integrate into the muscular system lining the inner socket, and be capable of responding to movement, light, and humidity. But the procedure was prohibitively expensive. Upon hearing this, I rummaged through my papers, shoved three thousand dollars into her hand, pushed her out of the house and bolted the door. She stood on the porch, mouth agape, her one eye blinking and deepening into an intense copper blue.

It was a Sunday when I sat in the still fragrant air by the narcissus, lost in thought, absent-mindedly watching the bulb flies at work. The yard was spongy from a recent rain and her shoes left gullies in the mossy grass. I first glimpsed something from a distance that seemed to glisten and melt into the low golden rays of late afternoon. Soon her bloated cheekbone appeared—then the eye itself, gluey, writhing, alive. Her nervous smile faded as she noticed my sickened expression. “It’s...just...” she blurted out between sobs “awful...isn’t it?!”

“Isn’t it!” I said.
Filling molds for plastic vaginas in the factory
he hears a voice dictating the poem and repeats it quietly under the machinery’s noise. He scoops white putty into the hollowed shape, smoothes
it down with a wide palette knife. The smell burns his throat as he kisses the clay. He thinks:
I am making a vagina.

The molds are carried by belt into the firing device,
heated, pressurized, hand-inspected by men who run thick fingers over them and stick their numbers there. Black vaginas and brown, some pea colored, some as white as china. He writes the poem in his mind, work so familiar he barely looks down while uttering words
removed from him and now—

his wife's doctor handles the model. He demonstrates just so, says You try it. But she shakes her head, slips the disk into her snap purse. Home, she gets out her mirror.
Gets out her paints, palette, brushes, canvas.
Removing shoes, blouse, skirt, slip, stockings, bra (reading his open manuscript: Venus
of the marriage manual haloed by a diaphragm),
she parts her hair and her lips.
SUMMER

required us / crush grapes / burgundy / drown Japanese beetles / in soap water / protect the house / slapped carpenter bees / with tennis racket / for pennies / each with the blade of a spade / we halved cutworms / a regular / factory / we ate / in sideways sun / five paper wasps / clung / to the steak tray / sucked trimmings / caterpillars spun / enormous tents /
father door to door / sold homemade mini-bombs / gypsy moths / sunk into our hair / glass reflections / robins smashed / we
Ritual before Marriage

You must acquire a live stick. Test it on horses, tap their rumps. If they rear their heads, gallop over the frozen lake, crashing through, knock the ground three times. The earth will shift and slide away from you, rolling under, sharpening the mountain’s edge. Another peak forms at its foot. Clap your hands to juggle fire. Your tongue may fan the flames. Align your smaller breast to face the larger mountain. Wash your hair when thaw comes.
As if this were any August [your stretched cornflower head]. Four deer leaping one by one over the low fence that separates our yard from the thick yellow field. They rip lush greenery off young tree branches. I woke [black blood and stitches along the right temple] to find the doe lifting and stamping its hoof. As if this afternoon the neighbor’s children will return, scramble out of the beat-up Volvo, clamor [ear drum sewn in] on the swing set, climbing dome, inflatable pool. Kyle will wander over with gloves, a jar, and a cracked magnifying glass. You will open the wine and rock in the rocking chair while flipping through a picture book of Micronesia. Sometimes you take notes. I will pull [surgeons press scalpel to frontal lobe] grandmother’s apron over my head and begin to slice onion until tears come and you finish the job. You mince the garlic because you do it best. Before the meal we sit in silence [burst on impact] while you recite a prayer memorized long ago and I pray to myself never god. Sometime during dinner the light and clouds will separate, you’ll turn me by the waist and say let’s dance.

Any August we’d be pressing flowers between thick paper Dee made in her bathtub last year. Piles of flowers categorized [not recognizable, you became so suddenly] by color, then we’d separate by shape. You’d affix the tiniest ones to miniature vases to give to the cousins’ children. You’d teach me how to knit again knowing [both lungs collapsed] I’ll forget by Rosh Hashanah. Any August we wait for the cloaked ascent of dark. Hear snakes along the path before we spot them. When magpies tear shingles from the roof and flickers wake us with their drilling I knock wearily to startle them away. We glue chips back onto our antique china plates [your toes, fingers, eyelids —]. I leave notes you answer. You slip your fingers through the blinds to touch morning’s fog. I see your hand lingering there [the same purple-blue]. We’re sitting up, peering out the window for a while.
SLOW

taste of coriander patient like sunrise in winter in falling over into her staying there wet slipping on stuck leaves slicked to pavement October evening cold his feet up above trees wiry fingers whipping her window into sleep sleep shhh loosening her gown

months after scraped raw of possible
twin tissue an inside-out razor burn not the careful brushing of artifacts not sleek deer on her way to the moonlit bathrooms into the dawn into the shell lifted from Edisto porpoises like heartbeats arriving into and out of stained azaleas afterimages of birth of quicksand.

The saline forest licking itself to its jagged edge
MONARCH

Feel the print of them the way her fingers touch interior marks mouth flutters over skin tongue answers each breast’s raised gold on soft green silk each expulsion of breath a sculptured time pressure returned for pressure bits of wax woven into morning’s mist entering the integument full sun on the warm lake of her. Body suspended. Wing-carried
SLIPPING A LITTLE

something in umbilical tubing the anesthesiologist’s smile in narrowing light black gurney’s universe tipped back injections y and z razor buzzing numb skin urine drain gas pumped organs part miniature camera slick metal scalpel cauterizing tools parceling nerves splintering undertow palpable sometimes laser-light

noon-light more morphine shots
somebody’s shushing

something crumbling crinkled before a wave dew-covered sapling shimmering aspen transporting dull brightness questions swirling nausea sea here hello hooked up quivering tide-line upon my body a body
FLORA’S EVE

You bring the simplest things. Binoculars to glimpse Jupiter’s moons, a glittering speck at nine o’clock. Your O’s shape the air, a bullfrog’s roll, pond’s surface puckers a static kiss. We build a fire, set marshmallows aflame with thin sticks poked down swelling bellies of anthills (all entrances sharply curved) but we quickly recall and blow them out. As tree edges feather with space, distant headlights project halos in the branches.
SOME PRINCESSES

have hard bottoms. Some rings dazzle more in a dish of dried beans. If you whisper, I'll draw close, pass swiftly in a long coat with borrowed buttons. If you call another's name, I'll catch. Maybe you're praying, already forbidden me, maybe the winds won't buoy you far, but bury you singing. If I sleep in your body's mark, I'll dream of skuas in a storm, seafarer drifting, cliffs bespangled with fog followed by nothing. Once, everything lifted, even your green eyes to mine. Your blouse. Your perpetual rocking, our damaged lullaby.
ARROWS

There are no arrows no people there is no spiral of smoke. Things are as they began. They are falling together under the chaos of water. Light hovers over the thin shoulder of the mantis. An arc of space where everything is met. The shifting of plates alters bodies.

There are no arrows no people

Tapestries of locusts ride the unpredictable air. They will descend and search for the thickest field to sustain them. They will ravish the earth. Boulders dissolve into salt. The grinding in the distance, the mind’s ocean. They will crawl up on limbs for a while. Survey their scars’ longing. Things are as they began
Notes

“In a Hush” is for my late aunt, Elizabeth Ann Gerace.

“Sheep in a Strange Field” was inspired and patterned after Kathleen Peirce’s poem “Quiet Lines” from The Ardors. “Before Mirrors” continues the pattern.

“Except the Wings, Flapping” is patterned after Linda Gregg’s poem “Slow Dance by the Ocean” from The Sacraments of Desire.

Sergei of “In the Karilian Forest” is a fictional character, though inspired by the real Sergei Kulakov, an artist and woodcarver who learned the ancient tradition of carving spirit figures from his great-grandfather in a forest village of northern Russia.

“The Hanging Poems” are in memory of Christopher Burkhard.

“Ghazal for Dying” is for my late grandmother, Ida Nastro.

“Whose Voice is Heard” is for my adoptive mother, Margaret Grant. The title in parenthesis is in Lakota. It is also my name.

“Generosity” is in the style of Charles Baudelaire.

“National Book Award Winner, 1962” was inspired by the New York Times obituary of poet Alan Dugan.

“Atlas of August” is in memory of Greta Wrolstad.

“Arrows” owes much to C.D. Wright’s poem “Humidity” from String Light. The poem was set to music by writer and composer Ramona Radonich.